America Must Choose

New Tariff Policy Would Require Many Sacrifices

Nation Must Decide Which Industries Are to Be Exposed to Real Foreign Competition.

This is the fourteenth of a series of articles written for the Foreign Policy Association and World Peace Foundation.

BY HENRY A. WALLACE
Secretary of Agriculture

In President Roosevelt's "Looking Forward," a book made up of his campaign declarations, he said: "Instead of romantic adventuring in foreign markets we expect and hope to substitute realistic study and actual exchange of goods. We shall try to discover with each country in turn the things which can be exchanged with mutual benefit and shall seek to further this exchange to the best of our ability. This economic interchange is the most important item in our country's foreign policy."

Foreign loans are all right provided at the time we make them we know that we are certain to have a tariff policy which permits their repayment. This means a totally different kind of tariff policy than we have ever had in the past. It means a considerable change in the psychology of the American people.

Ideally it means when we make a loan anywhere outside the United States that we know approximately the quantities of the different kinds of goods which we are going to accept from that nation in repayment. It means that we play the game in an even more definitely conscious way than England has played it with Argentina. I mentioned that method early in this pamphlet.

England loaned money to Argentina to build railroads and furnished the railroad equipment. In return, England received from Argentina its wheat and cattle. With us the necessity for definite planning in our loans and our tariffs is much greater than with England, because our tariffs are so much higher.

It is easy for foreign trade experts to talk about triangular and polyangular trade and thus avoid the necessity of forming clear-cut trade deals with a given country. But if we are going to trend toward internationalism, it seems to me that the only safe way to handle it is to conclude both loans and trade deals with foreign countries as nearly as possible on a bi-lateral basis and not get involved in the confusing complexities of triangular and polyangular trade with which the economists like to mess up our minds.

FEW people realize that it takes just as much planning to follow a plan of internationalism by exchange of goods, not promises, as it does the path of nationalism. The planning is of a different sort and is not as apparent to the rank and file of the people. England, because of the fact that it has had an extraordinarily well-educated upper class—able to think in terms of decades instead of in terms of weeks, and which also commanded the confidence of the rank and file of the people—has been about the only nation able to engage, for an impressive number of years, in plans of internationalism successfully.

A truly practical readjustment of our own tariff policy would involve the careful examination of every product produced in the United States or imported, and of the determination of just which of our monopolistic or inefficient industries we are willing to expose to real foreign competition. This problem should be approached from the point of view of a long-time national plan which we are willing to follow for at least twenty or thirty years, even if some of our friends get hurt, and howl continuously to high heaven.

Throughout the world, protected industries have been piling up surpluses, and howling for further protection and export outlets in the same breath. In such a struggle, all can not be winners. Tariff walls rear higher and higher; complaints multiply. In the confusion it sounds like a plea for freer trade. It is something very different.

What the nations demand in union is only more outbound traffic. More inbound traffic they feel they can not accept. Every surplus country needs deficit areas to balance it off; and as the surplus countries increase, the deficit areas decrease. Thus by inexorable logic, say the economic nationalists, the nations drive steadily on to economic isolation.

I HAVE tried to show that such conclusion does not inevitably follow. Nor should we conclude, from the fact that international trade has declined heavily throughout the world since 1929, that it is destined to decline permanently. Compared with the developed parts of the world, the relatively undeveloped parts are still very large. Among these we may include vast areas in Africa, India, China, Russia, South America and elsewhere.

Moreover, the nations that we consider well developed are probably nowhere near the limit of their possible development in civilized purchasing power. It would be mere guesswork to infer from the experience of the last few years that expansion in the world trade has passed the zenith. It may be that we have seen only the early stages. Expansion on sound lines, with trade based on genuine reciprocity of one sort or another, may furnish scope for expanding economic energy indefinitely.

Trade expansion forced at the point of the gun, is, of course, an entirely different matter. That game is never worth the candle. Certainly, however, opportunity still exists for the sane and peaceful expansion of world commerce.

Arrangements to bring in more goods, so that more may be sent out, involve pains as well as profits, and neither the pains nor the profits affect all citizens equally. It does not appeal strongly to an American manufacturer to be told that if he will sacrifice a part of his domestic market to his foreign competitors, our farmers will have a better foreign market. He wants to know at once if there is not a way to do the trick without hurting any one. There is none.

There will be actual pain, from dislocations in the business structure, and psychological pain from dislocations of traditional attitudes, and from denials of the traditional American opportunity to rule or misrule one's own business in one's own way, regardless of general consequences, what-ever course we choose.

MODERN YOUTH TO BE TOPIC OF FORUM SPEAKER

Son of Rabbi Stephen Wise to Talk at Kirshbaum Center Sunday.

Charges of irreverence, often made by an older generation against present-day youth, will be attacked Sunday night by James Waterman Wise, New York, speaker in the Indianapolis Open Forum at the Kirshbaum Center.

Mr. Wise is the son of Rabbi Stephen S. Wise. He attended Harvard and Columbia universities, and was graduated from Columbia with Phi Beta Kappa honors.

After a year in Cambridge university, England, where he studied to become a rabbi, he abandoned those plans, and since that time has written for various magazines, and lectured.

A series of articles, covering his studies of European youth in 1927, were published in the Century magazine.
