

—Let's Go Fishing— ANGLERS' CLUB IS HAUNT OF N. Y. WALTONS

Great Authorities on Art of Fishing Gather in Sacred Spot.

BY GEORGE H. DENNY
Times Fishing Editor

At 10 Hanover street, New York City, there meets every day for lunch a group of sportsmen called the Anglers' Club. If you haven't heard of them it's because you are not a trout fisherman, for here gather Bergman, Knicht, La Branche, Hewitt and others famous for their piscatorial prowess.

It was the privilege of this reporter to have luncheon at the club on a recent trek to New York. Drawn together by their love of the sport, the members pass the noon hour in discussion of theories far beyond this amateur.

Trophies precious to anglers line the walls of the attractive rooms. The prize is a signature of Izaak Walton, but a collection of the great Halford's flies, tied back in the 1880's, bids strongly for the honor.

Trout Not Only Interest

Most of the members tie their own flies and a few make the delicate but powerful rods that have killed the mounted trout that decorate the walls.

These men are explorers into the darkest corners of fishing science. They are students of trout stream insects, they have developed numerous variations of the standard wet and dry flies, to some few of the members goes the credit for perfecting the nymph lure so successful in eastern waters.

The interest is not only in trout fishing. Salt water angling, salmon fishing and bass fishing all have their following. Mine host, Alfred W. Miller, is authority for the statement that George La Branche feeling that there are few thrills left for him in trout fishing, has turned to the pursuit of the Florida bonefish.

Small Flies Favored

Members seem to favor the use of small flies when the fish are rising and large fanwings when trout are off their feed. The fly mentioned as the best allround bet for the sophisticated waters of the Esopus, Neversink, Beaverkill and Willowemoc was the Quill Gordon.

Eastern trout anglers, at least those in the metropolitan area, have their troubles in the form of closed waters. Nearly all the good stretches of streams within several hours of New York are the property of private clubs, and the few public waters left are so crowded that the anglers actually stand shoulder to shoulder on opening day. Maybe we mid-westerners aren't so badly off as we thought.

Here's a strange bit that I picked up in the big city. There's an old law on the books that states that any dead whales washed ashore on Manhattan Island shall be the property of Trinity church.

A team of three members of the Nyona Fish and Game Club, led by Eddie Beard, last Saturday speared thirty-five gar, eleven carp and two dogfish in the opening move of a drive to clear the lake of injurious denizens. The catch weighed more than 225 pounds.
