

Older Man's Friendship Helps Girl

'Summer Widower' Season Prompts Comment on Associates.

BY GRETTA PALMER
Times Special Writer

NEW YORK, June 18.—The summer-widower season is now beginning. Girls who have spent the winter dining on basement restaurant tables may now get a chance at Voisin's and Pierre's.

Miss Palmer

The New York tradition of sending the wife and children to the country for the hot months is a benefit to one all around. It gives each husband an annual taste of bachelor life and keeps him from getting stodgy. It gives his wife days of carefree independence, with nobody's moods to be considered but her own. And it does add zip and novelty to the social life of the women who stay in town.

We are far too much inclined in this country to keep the generations in decade-tight compartments. The love affair with a woman past 30, which is the normal experience of every 20-year-old Frenchman, is a rarity among boys in America. The young girl in this country finds herself invited to parties at which no man more than three years out of college appears.

And yet you are leading a drab and limited life. It includes some friends of a different age and attitude and even race from yourself.

In the most cosmopolitan city in the world many New Yorkers lead lives as provincial as if they lived in a hamlet in Arizona. They have restricted their sympathies to a single type of person, and they pay for it in poverty of living.

To have a few close friends is an essential of happiness. But if you see them, to the exclusion of every body else, you are apt to fall into a deep rut of conversationally. You develop little jokes of your own and talk in an idiom which is almost unintelligible to an outsider.

Entertains "Other Women"

A few acquaintances who have no real affection for you will keep you on your toes—you have to be entertaining with them, for otherwise you will never hear from them again.

The summer widower knows that his wife will go on loving him whether he is amusing at dinner or not. But when he takes another woman out, roof gardening, he puts his best foot forward conversationally. And it does him a world of good to have to be self-critical about his dancing, too.

Aids in Getting Poise

Contact with older men of authority and attainments is one of the most civilizing things that a young woman can have. Poise is rarely learned by going to college dances and cocktail parties given by the young married set.

It requires a certain background for its development, and background is apt to run into money. That is where the prosperous summer widower comes in.

When the old convention that forbade a girl's going out with a married man was swept into the dust bin Americans took an important step toward breadth of living.

It takes all kinds of men to make a world, and it takes some acquaintance with most of them to make a completely sympathetic woman.

jacket. The white acetate shirt is fastened with a zipper and has short sleeves. A bit of color is provided by a red beret and red linen kerchief, tied smartly around the neck.

A Woman's Viewpoint

BY MRS. WALTER FERGUSON

ONE bright lining appears in the clouds that darken June horizons. Commencement speakers simply can not tell graduates this year that the world is all theirs for the asking.

Just about the sanest advice we can give them now, and what they should have been told long ago, is that the world doesn't really care a thing about them. The sooner they find it out the better for their peace of mind.

College graduates face a universe in which they must justify their personal existence; and this they can never do without exercising all the intelligence they possess.

The same old admonitions retold so often from Erasmus to Spinoza, from Spinoza to Dewey and Santayana, must be told once again to the boys. From them should come strength of body, mind, heart and soul.

But for girls new messages are necessary. Women have one important gift to bestow upon their universe—beauty. Not the beauty which is to be had from lip-stick and mascara, but that which comes from qualities of tenderness, delicacy, compassion and an acute consciousness of human needs. To be specific, it is the grave, brooding quality of maternity, which is so comprehensive it can include within its circumference the frailest and the strongest, most arrogant life.

Women are keepers of the social conscience because wherever they are, there is home for man. And tomorrow's woman can not exert her power merely by performing the duties of the orthodox good wife and mother. To be sure, this will be asked of her, but she must be ready to do far more.

The civilization of the future depends largely upon the attitude of mind of those girls who are now leaving college and high school. If, like so many of their mothers, they are content to regard marriage as the end of their existence, or a career as sufficient excuse for life, then we are doomed to flounder and grope longer in our present confusion.

But if, as I hope and believe, they are conscious of their responsibilities in a time of great emergency, a new world will be theirs, not for the asking, but for the making.

Lace Gives Very Able Assistance to Today's Mode

By United Press

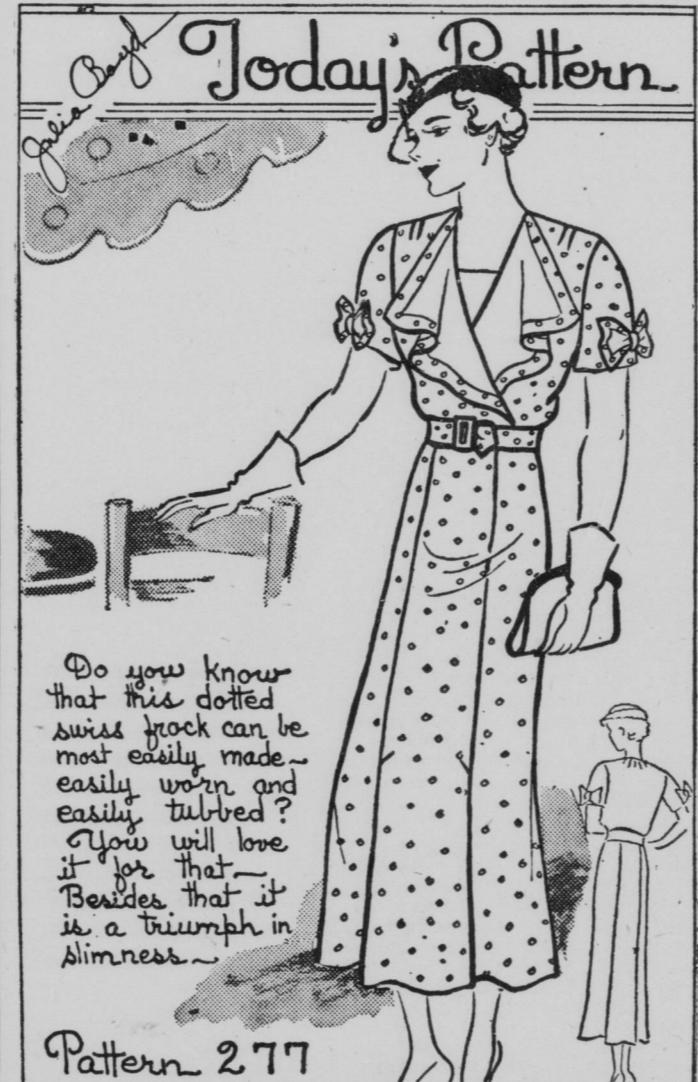

PARIS—Lace probably is the most friendly of all materials. It never gets stubborn or refuses to adapt itself to various natures.

If you are the strictly feminine type it will envelop you in whisperiness, and if you lean more toward the sturdy oak it can be crisp and utterly independent.

Agnes Drecoll gives you a good idea about what you can do with lace. She uses it for an evening gown in black over a slip of black cire satin.

The pattern is very fine and web-like and there is an oval trail edged with knife-pleated volants of lace. The cape worn with it, of sky-blue lace.

Lucien Lelong interprets the lace movement with a lovely thing in black called "Corinne." It is made over a clip of black crepe de chine and has a mat surface therefore, which is the direct reverse of the Drecoll gown.

Do you know that this dotted Swiss frock can be most easily made—easily worn and easily altered? You will love it for that. Besides that it is a triumph in slimmness.

Contract Bridge

Today's Contract Problem

West has the contract at four hearts. North opens the ten of diamonds, which South wins with the queen. South then cashes the king of diamonds. North plays the three, leaving West with the jack. What should the next lead be? If it is a diamond, would you lead the ace or a low card to set the hand?

Solution to Previous Contract Problem

BY W. E. M'KENNEY

Secretary American Bridge League

JUST because your contract is for only game is no reason why you should not try for the extra tricks.

Of course, when you have a long trump suit and control of side suits, your first thought should be to try for a squeeze play. The bidding—or the opening lead—may help you locate some of the cards.

In today's hand, after South opens with one heart, when West overcalls with two diamonds, vulnerable, he is showing a very good hand.

When North makes a free bid of two hearts, which is possibly just a little optimistic, and East bids two spades, East is also showing a five-card suit and some side strength—possibly a fit in diamonds.

WEST is eager to get a ruff, and since his partner has bid spades, he opens the deuce of spades. The eight is played from dummy. East plays the jack, and South wins the trick with the ace. He then leads a small heart and wins in dummy with the queen. This picks up the outstanding trump.

The nine of spades is returned from dummy. East covers with the queen, and South wins with the king. West discarding the five of diamonds.

Most players now would make the mistake of leading a club toward dummy's king, hoping thereby to find the ace of clubs in the West hand and make six odd.

You are assured of your contract even though you were to lose two club tricks—and you are pretty sure of being able to get an end play or a squeeze play to make your six odd.

The proper play is to lead a small heart, win in dummy with the king, return a heart, and then lay down five straight heart tricks, getting yourself down to the eight and four of clubs and the four of spades.

In the meantime, dummy is down to the king of clubs and the ten and six of spades. West is down to the ace of diamonds and the jack and seven of clubs.

East, however, becomes squeezed. He can let go the nine of clubs and three diamonds, but on the fifth heart he has to let go his queen of clubs, because, if he drops the spade, both spades in dummy will be good.

Now all declarer has to do is to lead a club, throw East in with the ace, and he is forced to lead from his seven and five of spades into dummy's ten and six, declarer thereby making six odd.
