

Widow Near 70 Succeeds at Writing

Ettie Stephens Prichard Waited Sixty Years to Realize Dream.

BY MARY MARGARET MERRIDE
NEA Service Staff Correspondent

NEW YORK, Sept. 5.—When the copy of "Old Farm," her first book, came from the publishers, Ettie Stephens Prichard, who is 67, couldn't bear for a whole day to look at it or even touch it.

There was the dearest wish of her life fulfilled, a novel actually written and published, yet now that it was done, she suddenly felt that nobody ever would buy it.

Finally, at midnight, she nerved herself to pick the volume up. And from then until dawn, when she finished the last word, she laughed and cried by turns.

At the end: "Why, I've written a book," she said to her daughter, Margaret, in a wondering tone, wiping her eyes.

"You see, I couldn't realize it then and I can't even now," she explained, wistfully. "But when you've waited anything as much for sixty years as I've waited to write, then it takes a little time to get accustomed to the knowledge that you have done it at last."

"After that, everything happened so fast that I didn't think even to think," Mrs. Prichard confessed, her candid gray eyes bright with the excitement of remembering.

Until two years ago this budding author was just an average housewife in an average small Illinois home. Her husband was county judge, and one daughter married and went east to live. The husband died, the old home was broken up and Mrs. Prichard and her younger daughter Margaret, who also sold a series of stories, came to New York.

"I brought two trunks with me, Mrs. Prichard relates. "One contained my clothes and the other was full of manuscripts that nobody except my husband and children and one or two neighbors had ever heard of."

"I was afraid to send any of my precious manuscripts to a magazine. I was too much in awe of the fine writers with grand names whose works they published. But I suppose I must have had a little hope tucked away in my heart; otherwise I'd have left that second trunk behind when Margaret and I set out on our great adventure."

The things Mrs. Prichard had always written about were those she knew best—the sights and sounds and smells of the farm where she was born.

"Old Farm"—the motion pictures are interested in it, by the way—gives a series of pictures of a little girl named Dood in Illinois sixty years ago and the people who surround the little girl are prototypes of the people who surrounded another girl whose name was Ettie.

It isn't quite exact to say that Mrs. Prichard began writing after she reached her sixties. The truth is that she has been writing all her life. But she never began selling until a little while ago when Helen Hull, in whose Columbia university short story writing class she had enrolled, told her she had talent.

A Woman's Viewpoint

BY MRS. WALTER FERGUSON

LATELY I've gone traveling, who have and gives to those who have not. And he'll be forced to it unless he wants to see the western plains dotted with human corpses as they have been dotted lately with dead animals.

When you drive through these portions of your country which God seems for a while to have forgotten, your mind turns instinctively to elemental facts. The depressions men manage to make, the misfortunes they inflict upon themselves, are of no consequence beside those nature sends.

If people starve amid plenty as they have been during the last five years, that is stupidity. If they starve because the earth refuses its fruits—that's disaster. The person who starves does not stop to analyze the difference, I am sure, but unless those who eat are completely brainless, no individual ever will hunger again while there is a surplus of food in our land.
