

Anniversary of Guild to Be Observed

St. Vincent's Hospital Group to Celebrate at Tea Tomorrow.

With its membership increased from 22 to 625, St. Vincent's Hospital Guild will celebrate its second anniversary at a founder's day tea from 3 to 5 tomorrow in the auditorium of the nurses home.

Mrs. Ellard B. Duane, founder, will be in the receiving line with Mrs. Rudolph C. Aufderheide, vice president, and Mrs. J. C. Consonide, second vice president. Mrs. Russell L. White, who assisted Mrs. Duane in the guild organization, will be one of the hostesses, including the other members of the board. Mesdames Gerald Ely, John Darnody, J. William Wright, Misses Alice McGowan and Helen Carroll. Committee chairmen also will be hostesses. They are Mesdames LeRoy Keach, William Freaney, Phil Durham, P. W. Zimmer, H. S. Noel, Frank Maden, Fred Thomas, George Lilly, Walter Brant, Harold Hoffman, Clifford Miller, Misses Ruth Casey and Mary Frances Boyle.

Mrs. Paul C. Furgason and Mrs. William McGowan arranged for the tea, which will have pink and green as a color scheme. Two tea tables will be decorated with spring flowers and lighted with pink tapers.

Aids in Charity Work
The guild was organized to assist the Daughters of Charity of the hospital in philanthropic work in the maternity department and children's ward and to make supplies and provide equipment for these departments.

Mrs. E. D. Fouts directs the welfare work and is assisted by Mrs. Brant. The charity cases are known as guest cases and only the special welfare committee of three members knows which are guest cases. Creed is not considered in the work, according to Mrs. Fouts.

One of the projects of the guild this past year was to equip and furnish a library and reading room in the maternity department for convalescent patients and visitors. This room was dedicated last Dec. 8 in memory of the late Sister Mary Joseph who for 30 years was superintendent.

The Red Cross committee organizes and conducts classes in home nursing and care of the sick. The course is given under the direction of Miss Ruth Zink, nursing instructor, and Miss Gertrude Gallagher, dietitian. Doctors of the staff give lectures in their particular fields.

Mrs. H. S. Noel is chairman of the sewing committee and is assisted by 12 members. The children's ward chairman is Mrs. Madden. This committee makes scrap-books for the children, who are given occupational envelopes each Tuesday morning. The committee also decorates covers for feeding trays and provides ward decorations and entertainment for the holidays.

Books Supplied
Library committee chairman is Mrs. Zimmer. This committee distributes books and reading matter. Books are donated by friends and members of the guild and some are bought by the guild. The library opened by the guild last month is used especially by convalescent patients. The chairman of the reader corps committee is Mrs. Clifford Miller. Members transport patients to and from the hospital and perform good errands. It serves former patients of the ward as well as children of mothers cared for by the welfare committee.

Other committee chairmen include: Purchasing, Mrs. Freaney; membership, Mrs. Fuch; Red Cross, Mrs. Thomas; P. S. notices, Mrs. Wright. Articles sent by the sewing committee are used in the nursery of the maternity department and in the children's ward. Complete layettes are made and given to needy and deserving mothers who are unable to provide for their babies. Miss Casey is chairman of the surgical dressings committee. Material for the dressing is supplied by the hospital and 50,000 dressings have been made in two years.

Spanish Club to Meet
At a meeting of the Spanish Club tonight at the home of C. O. Warnock, 4324 Park-av, Royal Gard will talk on Mexico. Mr. Warnock will show motion pictures of a trip to Mexico; Miss Adelaide Conte will give a Spanish poem and Mrs. George Ottman will play piano numbers.

Alpha Nu chapter, Alpha Zeta Beta sorority, will entertain members and pledges at a cocktail party at 8 tonight with Misses Alice and Ann O'Donnell, hostesses, at their home, 950 Hervey-st.

Treasure McGuire owed her name to the love her mother bore her, and her beauty to her grandmother who had been a dancer. Described with her mother and five younger brothers and sisters by her brother, Treasure obtains employment in a night club as a hostess, though she is but 18.

When her father returns he is not displeased that Treasure is earning money, though she is only 18. Treasure, who continues her distasteful occupation partly because her mother, who is ill and going to have a baby, needs the things her tips can buy. Treasure has accepted the friendly guidance of Oliver Keith, piano player in the orchestra. Juanita Deane, another hostess, hates Treasure because Rudolf Molinari, rich young patron whose favorite she once had been, ignores her for Treasure. Rudolf, learning that Treasure likes the tango, has promised to bring his younger brother, Tony, who dances the tango, to the club.

NOW GO ON WITH THE STORY

CHAPTER SIX
JULIO MOLINARI was not alone and as Treasure gazed at the boy with him something unprecedented took place in her heart. The resistance which until now had protected her from romantic attachments was shattered at a single glance from eyes as velvety and black as Rudolf's.

Slim and tall and graceful, he was a counterpart of his brother without Rudolf's assertiveness, also without the small mustache.

Where Rudolf's mouth was greedy the younger boy's was generous; but there was the same vivid expression, the same distinctly Italian cast to features strongly individual.

Their faces which would have stood out in any crowd and, although she had seen him only once, Treasure knew she would never forget him. She felt a flash of premonition which warned her that for good or evil—whatever might be the outcome—he was to be a part of her life. She possessed to a strong degree a Celtic awareness of unseen forces and although she could not have put it into words her whole being was flooded with a sense of recognition.

To say, "There is the man I love," would have sounded foolish, but her heart acclaimed it with every wild, sweet beat as she sat quietly waiting.

Juanita was dancing, but her eyes also followed the two men as they approached the table where Dorothy and Treasure were sitting. As she had feared Rudolf turned his brother over to Dorothy while all his attention was centered upon the black gown girl, but Juanita could not hear his greeting.

"How are you, sweetheart?" he cried, taking possession of Treasure's hand. Holding it while he made the introduction.

"This is my brother Anthony. You remember I promised to bring him along to tango with you." She lifted dazzled eyes as Anthony bowed. There was a foreign tinge to his manner which delighted her.

"You like to dance the tango?" he murmured in a low, serious voice which made little shivers of excitement run up and down her spine.

"Oh, yes!"
"Don't forget," Rudolf interrupted, "that Treasure is my discovery. You're only to tango with her." He laughed, but both girls caught the note of possession in his voice.

"As the older brother I shan't hesitate to assert my rights." Anthony without replying turned to Dorothy and asked her to dance so that in spite of Treasure's pleading glances she was left alone with Rudolf.

"Sit closer to me," he commanded. "Now tell me how've you been? I intended coming back the very next week but we've been so busy. You know how it is when you've been away."

Treasure didn't know, never having been away from San Francisco, but she nodded unhesitatingly. He was still holding her hand and now he whispered, "What time will you be through?"

"I don't know."
"I'm going to wait for you." Treasure was in her reply. "Oh, no, Mr. Molinari, you mustn't do that."

"Why not?"
"I have another engagement."
"I don't believe it. You're still afraid of Juanita."

He sent the other hostess a careless smile as he said, "You can see she's busy with some one else." "But she won't be all evening," Treasure reminded him. "Please don't do anything to hurt her. It isn't worth it."

He leaned closer laughing into her eyes. "It isn't?"
"No!"
"I think I should be allowed to be the judge of that," he insisted. For the second time she felt a crisp paper bill pressed into her hand but this time she refused it. "It's awfully kind of you to be so generous, but I can't take this."

"You did before."
"I know I did but I still feel I shouldn't have. It was too much." "Plenty more where that came from."
"No," she said resolutely, pushing it back.

"Don't be silly," he said, frowning. "It doesn't obligate you to be nice to me if that's what you mean."

Before Treasure had time to reply Dorothy and Anthony had returned. "When do we have that tango?" the boy asked, ignoring Rudolf.

GLAD of a chance to escape and longing to dance with him, Treasure said hastily, "I'll ask the orchestra to play one."

A moment later she stood beside the orchestra leader.

"Will you play a tango next?" she asked.

Her eyes avoided Oliver's. She felt as if he must understand the blushes dyeing her cheeks; the radiance in her eyes. But if he saw these things he made no comment and presently came the first strains of the requested dance.

There were so few in the club that night no one else even attempted to compete with the two young persons. Strangers a few minutes before their spirits merged as their bodies met and parted. Never in her life had Treasure even dreamed of such delight in rhythm as was hers for these few moments.

The fascination which had struck like lightning with her first glance at him increased a hundredfold when he took her in his arms. Such tenderness, such passion, such light gay precision, such gentle strength and subtle magnetism were displayed by him in the intricacies of this dance which seemed to project them upon a higher plane.

There was a mysticism to the steps as danced by the Italian which Carlos, perfect as he was in technique, had not been conscious of. They did not speak but when the music ceased a glance passed between them which said more than words.

Treasure sat down trembling. Whatever this incomprehensible feeling which had assailed her the moment she looked at him, she knew now he shared it. But the situation lay in his hands. She must wait for him to make the first move.

It was Rudolf who claimed her. Rudolf who said condescendingly, "That was very pretty. You made me sorry I've never learned it."

He ordered drinks, but Treasure scarcely knew "what was happening. She was in a daze. Even Juanita's baleful gaze from the table where she sat with her brother and egg man could not quench that flame of happiness. When Rudolf asked her to dance she rose obediently, remaining so remote in his embrace that his vanity was hurt.

"That's nothing but a kid," he warned her. "Won't be 21 until next September."

Kid or no kid. What did it matter to her whose 18-year-old eyes had found him far superior to the man who held her tightly whispering, "I'm eight years older than he."

"Damn it!" he cried. "You can't be as indifferent as you sound." She apologized then.

"I'm sorry!"
"I'm going to take you home tonight," he muttered close to her ear, "whether you like it or not."

"No!" she repeated, shaking her head.

Rudolf laughed victoriously. "And I say I will. When you know me better you'll realize that resistance only encourages me. One way or another I get what I want. You may as well make up your mind to that."

His words made her shiver a bit with apprehension but she did not reply. She would not go home with him. Not if she stayed there all night.

As their dance was concluded she saw that Juanita, free at last, had joined the other two at their table. "I'll dance with her," murmured Rudolf, "but don't forget what I've said."

A few moments later he did so. Some one asked for Dorothy and Anthony and Treasure were left alone. He wasted no time.

"May I take you home?" he asked in his low, slightly foreign sounding voice.

There was no intention of evading him as she asked in return, "Aren't you with your brother?"

"Yes, but you and I can take a taxi."
"Meet me outside," she directed. "When the orchestra stops playing 'I'll leave by the back door.'"
His face, so serious for a boy of his age, suddenly lighted with a smile.

A frown crossed his face, but his hands did not falter.

"Bad business," he said briefly.

She knew what he meant. Understood only too well that her relationship with customers was not supposed to continue beyond the doors of the club.

"I'm sorry, Oliver," she said as if begging him to be lenient. "This time I must."

They were sweeping into the last measure as Treasure whispered to Dorothy, "get my things from the check stand and put them in the kitchen, will you?"

Dorothy nodded.

"Trying to fool Juanita?"

"No! Just do as I say, please, and I'll explain tomorrow."

"Oke and Oke," the other girl said good naturedly, proceeding to the check stand as Treasure returned to Rudolf.

"Are you ready to leave now?" he asked in a tone perfectly audible to the others.

"As soon as I get my things," she replied, flashing an uncontrollable glance at Anthony.

"Mind taking a taxi home?" Rudolf inquired of his younger brother.

"Not at all," Tony replied rising. "And I may as well go now."

Without a glimpse of the amusement they felt, both said goodnight and Tony went toward the entrance as Treasure walked to the kitchen leaving Rudolf and Juanita together.

Once hidden from their eyes she seized the coat and hat Dorothy had left on a chair and let herself out by the back door. The alley was deserted. She ran holding her breath to the front of the club where a taxi was waiting. Not until Tony had asked her address and lifted her inside did she dare relax but as they drove away both burst into peals of laughter.

"Pretty clever, what?" he asked.

"It was perfect but I'm afraid your brother will resent it."

"Let him," Anthony chuckled. "Do him good for somebody to turn him down."

Serious again, he leaned closer and took her hand.

"There's nothing between you? You're not really his girl or anything like that?"

"I've never seen him but once before in my life."

"That's good. I suspected it, but the way he talked . . . He's so blameworthy," he explained.

"Not that he hasn't had reason to be. You should see the way the darts fell for him on this trip we took."

"You must have had a lot of fun."

"We did. You see when my father died mother wanted me to finish college and I wanted to go into the business so we compromised on a trip around the world which Rudolf thought would do me more good."

He called it my education, but I noticed he managed to acquire a lot of new ideas himself."

"Yes, Rudolf would," she thought. Happy to realize that the two were so different. No shadow of doubt crossed her mind as she sat beside him listening as if hypnotized while he told her of the places he had seen, the things he had seen and done.

When the taxi stopped before her home he drew her unresisting into his arms. Their lips met in a long, sweet kiss before he whispered, "I'll see you again soon."

RENT
A Grand or Upright PIANO

Now let's take up East's problem. The queen of clubs will hold the trick, but should he let it hold? He heard the bidding and he knows that his partner has at least five clubs. If South has no club, it doesn't look as if there is a chance to defeat the contract.

South has bid spades and West can't be expected to have any spade strength. The ace and king of hearts are on the board; therefore, West's side strength, to make his vulnerable overall of two clubs, must be in diamonds.

So, regardless of what the declarer does, whether he goes up with the king or plays the seven of clubs, East should play the ace of clubs and immediately return the jack of diamonds. Of course, this play defeats the contract one trick. (Copyright, 1935, NEA Service, Inc.)
