FLYING With MAJ. AL WILLIAMS

Chief of Air Service
Scripps-Howard Junior Aviator

It is curious how we can go on for an indefinite length of time, putting up with some little irritation just through sheer inertia.

It was the same with aircraft designers and radiators for water-cooled motors. Until 1923, everybody had been content to use old fashioned types of radiators which offered tremendous resistance and cut down the speed of planes.

The majority of the radiators had been of the rectangular type similar to those used on autos. Then a Frenchman, by the name of Lambin, came out with a radiator that looked like a bee hive and offered considerably less resistance than the rectangular style.

But American ingenuity went the whole gang one better. We built corrugated radiators and laid them flat on our wings. Thus the engine was cooled with only a small percent of air resistance.

In other words, American racing ships and engines inspired England, France and Italy to imitate and develop new engineering thoughts just as the speedy American clipper ship of sailing boat days had inspired their marine engineers a century before.

And the performance of the Douglas and Boeing transports in the MacRobertson trophy race from England to Australia again awakened Europe to the possibilities of high-speed transportation. The tremendous amount of speed shown by these huge transports amazed the world.

From 1923 to 1925 America held all the speed records, but Europe had learned her lesson and instead of permitting haphazard development of ships and motors for the Schneider races, both the British and Italian governments officially took over the research work and development of racers. And from 1926 on, they have managed to stay approximately 100 miles an hour ahead of the best American performance.

The significance of this move is clearly defined in the words of the then minister for air of Great Britain when he addressed this plea to the British Parliament:

"If you will appropriate the money for the development of high-speed engines and ships to represent England in the coming Schneider Trophy Race, I promise that as a result, England will be possessed of the finest and fastest airplanes in the world."

QUESTION—At what altitude do airline transports make their best speeds?

Ordinarily they travel fastest at from 8000 to 10,000 feet.

BACK TO PENDLETON

Darrell Paul Jones Gives Self Up After Prison Escape.

Darrell Paul Jones, who escaped from the Indiana State Reformatory at Pendleton several weeks ago, returned voluntarily yesterday, according to word received from reformatory officials.

Jones escaped in a break in which Simon Dyer was killed, Robert McCallister was wounded, and Robert Sanders was captured.
