VICE CONDITIONS BARED AT TRIAL BLAMED ON PAY

Honest Work Brings Girls as Little as $2.50 a Week, Is Charge.

By GEORGE H. BEALE

United Press Staff Correspondent
NEW YORK, May 22.—While a woman known as "Cokey Flo" revealed new secrets of a $12,000,000-a-year vice ring today, a Florence Crittenton League survey blamed a large share of prostitution upon employers who pay girls as little as $2.50 a week.

The league said housewives who demand "bargains" in domestic help are among the worst offenders.

A survey made for the annual report of the league which cares for delinquent girls, showed that of 561 girls, only 15 ever had earned more than $15 a week. Thirty-three never had earned more than $2.50 a week. 21 had earned a maximum of $3.75. The average was around $3.

General housework was the dominant occupation among the delinquent girls. There were 170 domestic workers among the 561; 82 factory workers, 58 waitresses, and the rest were clerks, manicurists, dancers and of similar other classifications.

"Cokey Flo," whose real name is Florence Brown, was the second witness of the trial of 10 men accused of compulsory prostitution to directly accuse Charles (Lucky) Luciano, said he had reaped a fortune from the conditions the Crittenton League reported.

Luciano Linked to Ring

The woman had been identified by previous witnesses as one of the more prominent keepers of disorderly houses and she said she knew all the defendants in a business "way." Last night's court adjournment interrupted her testimony.

Luciano was glowering at her across the room. Before she appeared, Joseph Bonanno, a six-time felon serving a 15-year life sentence in Sing Sing Prison, pointed a finger at Luciano's sullen figure and said the alleged vice leader had personally hired him a year ago to collect gang tribute from brothels.

The increasing attack upon Luciano indicated that Special Rackets Prosecutor Thomas E. Dewey was nearing conclusion of the state's case. Other witnesses had identified all of Luciano's fellow defendants as members of the ring.
