

COTTONY SCALE VIEWED DANGER TO TREES HERE

Spray Is Advised as Best Means to Destroy Insect.

During the past two weeks the cottony maple scale has become conspicuous in Marion County, Horace E. Abbott, county agricultural agent, said today.

This destructive scale insect, which at this season is conspicuous because of its resemblance to a string of popcorn on the underside of maple, linden, boxelder and other tree branches, has not been abundant in Indiana for several years, Mr. Abbott explained.

This year, he pointed out, there is evidence that natural insect enemies, which normally hold it in control, have been reduced in numbers, probably due to the extreme cold winter.

Trouble Is Anticipated
Trouble from the pest is anticipated for the next few years. Cases may require artificial control operations, he added.

The large cottony masses which identify the insect contain thousands of eggs from which the young hatch, according to the agent. Before many weeks the eggs will hatch and the young will begin to suck plant juices. They will be only partly grown when cold weather arrives, he said.

The only reliable control, Mr. Abbott said, is spraying during the dormant season with a 2 or 3 per cent dormant oil spray, the percentage of oil in the diluted spray depending on the abundance of scales.

Where there is danger of the pest killing trees, certain contact sprays may be used provided all parts of the foliage are reached, he said.
