Effects of Intoxicants

By W. E. GILROY, D. D.
Editor of Advance
International Uniform Sunday School Lesson for April 18

WHEN we study lessons in Genesis and Leviticus, we are reminded of the questions that confronts us frequently concerning man's essential nature. Is he at heart naturally evil and "fallen," or is he naturally good, progressing through ignorance and error toward something higher and better, subject to temptation, but not inherently wicked?

Calm observation of the whole course of human life would suggest that there is truth on both sides, that man is naturally neither wholly good nor wholly evil, but with capacities for both good and evil, and subject to the direction in which the uppermost influences may guide him.

If one doubted man's tendency toward sin and evil, surely he would find the evidences of it in the role of alcohol and similar destructive agencies have played in human life. The history of man's degradation through alluring things that have affected his senses and destroyed his self-control is not confined to any particular period of time, people or place. A study of modern primitive communities reveals that native races have found their own forms of intoxication, and the use of intoxicating beverages seems to go back to the very childhood of such races.

Our temperance lesson is based upon a reference to Sodom and its destruction, and to a further reference to Sodom found in Deuteronomy.

Increase in Rural Life Is Predicted

Catholic Bureau Director Conducts Conference On Problems.

The rural population will double within a century, Dr. Edgar Schmiedeler, O. S. B., director of the National Catholic Welfare Conference Rural Life Bureau, said here.

Rural Aids Discussed

The purpose of the institutes is to encourage Catholic activities in rural districts and to acquaint priests and laymen with Federal, state and local legislation and other aids to such action.

Bishop Ritter presided at the session at the Severin Hotel. Other speakers on the program were the Rev. Fr. Raymond Marchino, North Vernon, Ind., diocesan director; C. E. Oldham, Wilson Taylor in the Memorial Presbyterian Church, general manager, Indiana Farm Bureau Co-operative Association, and P. G. Beck, assistant regional director of the Resettlement Administration.
