

Beauty Treatment Held Safer and Better Than Insulin in Mental Cases

Eyebrow Arches, Marcel and Facials Prescribed by Central Hospital Head as Eastern Scientists Experiment With Shocks.

Eight hundred eighty seven eyebrow arches; 3324 marcel waves, 1227 facials!

Tucked away in the annual report of the Central State Hospital for Insane, released today, was an account of the year's beauty parlor treatments for patients.

Dr. Max Bahr, Superintendent, said that these beauty treatments for women patients suffering from dementia precox have been highly successful.

"One of the first signs of recovery," he said, "that some women suffering from dementia precox show is an interest in their personal appearances.

"When they come here some of them are listless and inattentive to anything. We try to quicken their interest and comprehension in things outside themselves by breaking through their indifference and apathy. This seems to work better than most any other treatment in that category. We have effected some complete cures, due as much as anything else to such beauty treatments."

More Tests Awaited

The report, made to Governor Townsend, repeated the stand of the Hospital not to try insulin shock treatments for dementia precox until the treatments have been more thoroughly tested.

"The treatment," Dr. Bahr said, "has been used in the East for the last three years and we believe it has been inadequately tested. It is very severe, and we believe results in death more often than has been reported.

Until we are convinced that the chances of death it involves are well balanced with the chances of recovery, we will watch developments in other places and reserve decision."
