Duke and Duchess of Windsor Are Not Expected to Remain Long at Post in the Bahamas

By JOAN YOUNGER

NEW YORK, Sept. 10 (U. P.).—Neither the Duke or Duchess of Windsor nor the Bahamians think that the former British King's job as Governor of the Bahamas will last very long.

This is the conclusion reached after a month at Nassau during which the Duke and Duchess, accompanied by their children, have been in the island and talked with innumerable residents and officials.

The last time I spoke to the Duchess she went so far as to say flatly that she did not consider Government House as "hers" but as an official residence. This fact, she said, underlay all her plans for its redecoration.

"I want to do this house so that the next Governor can move right in without having to redecorate," she said. "It isn't as if it were my home—it is an official residence and I want to decorate it to harmonize with anyone's belongings."

The inference that her husband's job as Governor of the Bahamas is only temporary fits in with the general belief in Nassau that the Duke is only stopping off in the small capital on his way to bigger things.

But what these bigger things are is a matter of controversy. Many Bahamians believe that even while Governor of the Islands, he will serve as an unofficial good will ambassador to America. The Duke himself denied this, though he stressed his feelings of friendship for the United States and expressed a wish to "be back soon." He declared that both he and the Duchess would make a trip "after the elections and before the new year" to Canada to visit his ranch at Calgary.

"America is, after all, the Duchess' own country," he said with a smile at his wife.

Duchess Dislikes Heat
There also was worried speculation in Nassau about the fact that the Duchess was suffering from the intense summer heat. One official told me there was a general feeling that if the Duke asked his brother, King George VI, to be withdrawn from the King would comply with his wishes. And that, the official said, would be a tragedy for the Bahamas, a final blow at their dwindling tourist trade which has already suffered as result of the war.

When I asked him if he thought that the Windsors would make such a request, he refused to reply, but he added that at any rate, he didn't think they would be there long.

"It is just a temporary question of giving his Royal Highness safety," he said. "When the war blows over, he may be reinstated in England or retire to private life. Unless, of course, the impossible happens and Hitler wins. In that case the Duke would be in a very valuable position indeed."

The official explained if the British Isles themselves were conquered the long talked of Federated West Indies might come into being, and the Duke would certainly be in line for its presidency.

The fact that the Duchess would like to get away—at least for awhile—from Nassau was obvious. One of the last things she said to me was: "How I envy you going back to New York!"

Arbutus Garden Club Members Picnic
The Arbutus Garden Club was to have a covered dish picnic today at the home of Mrs. Frank Flanner, Cold Spring Road. Mrs. Robert Miles and Mrs. T. W. Massoth, the hostesses, were to serve the dessert course.
