of an alleged quotation which, if made, was discreditable. This quotation is supposed to have come from some one in Philadelphia having no connection with the national Republican ticket."

Mr. Roosevelt said the New York Times had reported that a "prominent leader of the Philadelphia bar," speaking for the Republican candidates, had declared: "The President's only supporters are paupers, those who earn less than $1200 a year and aren't worth that, and members of the Roosevelt family."

"I could as well condemn the third term candidate and his whole New Deal party for the irresponsible act of his own secretary in kicking in the stomach a Negro policeman who was only doing his duty," Mr. Willkie continued. "I utterly condemn the alleged utterance of that Philadelphia lawyer, just as the third term candidate should condemn the act of his secretary."

"The whole purpose was to stir up class hatred and divide our people. That was the tactic of Lenin, the strategy of Hitler and the preaching of Trotsky."

Argument Term Shallow

He said Mr. Roosevelt "attempted to defend his record of continually unbalanced budgets and astronomical expenditures by citing the abnormally low interest rate at which a recent issue of short term government notes were sold."

"The shallowness of this argument must be disturbing to anyone with the slightest understanding of economics. There is an obvious reason why Government securities find a market at such low interest rates. It is because the policies of the New Deal have so limited the opportunities for investment in productive private enterprise that makes job, that money has been driven out of productive employment and into the bomb-proof shelters of tax-exempt Government bonds."

The third-term candidate pretended that the policies of his Administration had been beneficial to the little businessman of America. This is completely false. As a matter of fact, small business has suffered under the New Deal far more than big business. Small business, as a whole, has not made a profit in any single year under the New Deal.

Takes Issue on Planes

Mr. Willkie broadcast last night from his special train a charge that Mr. Roosevelt was feeding the nation "deceptive optimism" in outlining his objective of any production of 50,000 airplanes annually.

He said New Deal "neglect and abuse" had so stagnated the aviation industry that it would be years before this country could reach that military goal or send to Great Britain's aid the 26,000 planes that he believed nation needs.

"Once again the third-term candidate has given us a speech about defenses that are not on hand—but just on order," he said in taking issue with the President's Boston speech.

He charged that Mr. Roosevelt did not show any indication of an interest in airplanes and airplane production until eight months after the fall of Poland.

Citing William S. Knudsen to the effect that the country would not reach a production goal of 36,000 planes a year until the spring of 1942, Mr. Willkie continued: "If we succeeded in fulfilling the schedule, which we are not doing at this time, we will still be far short of the goal of 50,000 planes toward which the third-term candidate says we are making such rapid progress."

"And when the third-term candidate talks about 26,000 planes for Britain, let's not fool the British people. We must arm Britain with planes, not disarm her with political speeches. It will still take years to fill their orders."

"It is time to turn our backs on the wasted years of stifled enterprise, neglected industry and chronic unemployment."

with a dictatorial form of government.

"I am fighting against the revival of government by special privilege; government vested in the hands of those who favor and would have to nominate the foreign dictators," was the battle cry on which Mr. Roosevelt held his final drive for a third term.

He has one more speech after tonight, a radio talk from his Hyde Park home Monday night, election eve.

He will make a rear platform speech in Erie, Pa., this afternoon.

Charges Fear Campaign

Mr. Roosevelt said last night that an "ominous combination" was forming within the Republican Party between "the extreme reactionary and the extreme radical elements of the country."

"Something evil is happening . . . when a full page advertisement against this Administration, paid for by Republican supporters, appears—where, in all places?—in the Daily Worker, the newspaper of the Communist Party."

He said his opponents were spreading a campaign of fear, "as an example . . . certain insurance companies are now sending letters to their policy holders, warning them that if this Administration is retained in office, their policies will shrink in value."

Objectives Restated

But underlying all of this was a restatement of the social reform objectives which have been the keystones of the New Deal.

It was a speech that brought repeated cheering from his audience of 3000 in the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

There were no wisecracks, no gags like "Martin, Barton and Fish." It was a sober and earnest President, perhaps by now truly disturbed by reports of mounting Republican gains, who sought to define and emphasize all the New Deal has stood for in its relation to this forgotten man.

Turns Scorn on Opponents

Bluntly Mr. Roosevelt, recalling the battle that had been made for this forgotten man, demanded to know whether it was the wish of the country to abandon these men at an intermediate stage of one-quarter of one per cent. They were oversubscribed 18 times," he said.

to control our public opinion with mass propaganda and slogans, and finally to demand a third term.

"They have driven our economy on fear, not upon faith; upon tied men, not free men. The end result was to fix depression as a chronic way of American life. This mummification of our economy will obscure it momentarily, but the consequences are inevitable."

A plateau of WPA pickets, meantime, paraded across the White House, placarding protests against what they termed efforts in New York to frighten relief workers into voting the Democratic ticket.

In Pittsburgh Socialist Norman Thomas said both the Republican and Democratic campaigns were phoney.

Bluntly Mr. Roosevelt, recalling the battle that had been made for this forgotten man, demanded to know whether it was the wish of the country to abandon these men at an intermediate stage of one-quarter of one per cent. They were oversubscribed 18 times," he said.

He asserted that he is fighting to prevent this trend—"fighting for a free America—for a country in which all men and women have equal right to liberty and justice."

"I am fighting to keep this nation prosperous and at peace. I am fighting to keep our people out of foreign wars and to keep foreign conceptions of government out of our own United States."

"I am fighting for these great and good causes. I am fighting to defend them against the power and might of those who now rise up to challenge them."

"And I shall not stop fighting."

I Shall Not Stop Fighting

Quoting from the New York Times, he said that a leader of the Philadelphia bar had said that the only supporters of the New Deal are "paupers, those who earn less than $1200 a year and aren't worth that, and the Roosevelt family."

What I did say was that in view of the tremendous issues in this campaign, I could not understand any thinking American voting for a continuance of the present Administration except those included in three classes—first, those unfortunate who say no way of obtaining tomorrow's breakfast except by going to an office and drawing down $11, $13 or $15 per week relief funds, which they believe came from the Administration's emergency fund," Mr. McCracken said.

The second group I referred to were Federal employees and the third the President and the members of his family.

Everyone now knows that millions of Americans rich and poor, old and young, men and women are going to vote the Democratic ticket on Tuesday."

Mr. McCracken said the speech in which the "pauper" statement was attributed to him had been "distorted" by the newspapers.

"I have no copy of the address," he said, "but an audience of at least 300 Republican women of Pennsylvania heard it and I know that they will confirm what I have said."

Henry A. Wallace said across Pennsylvania to conclude a 25,000-mile campaign tonight in Milford, Del.

Speaking last night at Steubenville, O. Mr. Wallace attacked what he termed a "dastardly campaign of fear" of Republican leaders.

"If we should drug ourselves with the quack remedies that the Republican leaders are trying to sell us, we could easily be taken like Denmark and Norway, Holland, Belgium and France," he said.

He told a press conference in Indianapolis that Mr. Willkie will receive a majority of 900,000 to 1,000,000 in upstate New York against a majority of 525,000 for President Roosevelt.

Mr. Willkie's prediction of electoral votes showed 353 for Mr. Willkie and 178 for Mr. Roosevelt.

Mr. Willkie has endorsed the Republican nomination.

Alexander Woolcott said in New York he would vote for President Roosevelt because Mr. Willkie's record, in his opinion, consisted of "a blank, a blank, my Lord."

Mr. Woolcott said he held the Republicans to blame for offering the nation a choice of Mr. Roosevelt as against "nothing."
