'Mr. Van's' 40 Freshmen Don't Want Class to End

By EARL HOFF
The dismissal bell is always sneaking up on the arts and crafts classes at Shortridge High School, ringing when it seems to the pupils they have only begun to work.

Sometimes the teacher, T. P. VanVoorhees, head of the department, has to shoo the youngsters to their next class. The course is that interesting.

Right now the classes are engaged in making things of leather. Several of the pupils are making leather jackets. Others are fashioning belts, moccasins, billfolds, letter holders, and archery cuffs.

First, "Mr. Van," as most people at Shortridge call Mr. VanVoorhees, gave each of the 40 pupils a leather knife and taught them to keep it sharp. Then the pupils fashioned leather tools of large nails. Their first leather project was a sheath for their working knife.

The neatest and most baffling trick the pupils have learned is how to make a woven belt without splitting the ends of the leather strap. It can be done.

The arts and crafts classes started the semester by making stamps from rubber erasers. With these, they stamped paper book jackets. Then they proceeded to the more difficult job of binding a complete book.

After the leathercraft work, the pupils will tackle design and construction of wooden boxes and bowls.

Next will be the problem of simple woodcarving. Before the end of the semester the pupils also will experiment with pottery and simple jewelry.
