DEMAND GROWS FOR WAR UNITY

High Command Representing All Allies Needed to Assure Victory.

By WILLIAM PHILIP SIMMS
Scripps-Howard Foreign Editor

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10.—If Singapore falls, sweeping changes in allied war planning are regarded as inevitable. A supreme war council supported by an inter-allied general staff may be among the innovations.

"If Singapore falls," the Sydney (Australia) Daily Mirror said some four weeks ago, "Churchill will fall with it. Its fall would be a calamity for Australia, the British Empire and the whole allied strategy in the Pacific. . . . The political repercussions would be cataclysmic."

While few are inclined to dispute the gravity of the allied position in Australia, the Indian Ocean and the western Pacific generally, no one in authority here believes that Winston Churchill is in any danger of being supplanted as Prime Minister. There appears to be no one who even remotely measures up to him as a great national leader.

Demand Allied Council

Nevertheless, just as in the crucial days of 1918, there is a fast-growing demand for a more far-sighted, better co-ordinated inter-allied war planning in which all the principal allies would be represented.

In the first World War it was not until nearly two years had passed and defeat after defeat had been suffered by the allies that they even began seriously to co-operate on the various fields of battle. Russia's armies had been routed by Von Hindenburg. The Anglo-French offensive of 1915-16 had been stopped without appreciable gains. Serbia had been trampled under foot. Gallipoli had been ingloriously evacuated. The British had been beaten by the Turks at Kut-el-Amara, and the French had just managed to hold their own at Verdun.

Effective Action Delayed

Only then, as Historian Hayes remarks, "did the Allies lose faith in the precepts of the old international anarchy and evince a willingness to abandon, at least temporarily, some of their individual sovereign rights for the sake of creating an effective League of Nations against imperialistic Germany."

On March 27, 1916, the first general war council was held at Paris with France, Britain, Italy, Belgium, Serbia, Japan, Montenegro and Portugal represented. In April there was an inter-allied parliamentary conference, and in June an economic conference.

Even so, as events proved, Allied co-operation was not as complete or as effective as it had had to be. Only in the conflict's fourth year did the Allies get around to creating a supreme war council and an inter-allied general staff.

Some Progress Made

Unity of command under Foch, was not achieved until March, 1918, when the specter of imminent and overwhelming defeat stared the Allies in the face.

Today the united nations appear to have reached the point where the allies were in 1916. Or almost there. There is an Anglo-American joint staff. Some progress has been made in the direction of pooling resources, and in the Atlantic and Pacific there is something like unity of command.

According to military realists, a central war planning board is imperative to allied victory.
