In on the 'Kill' as Women Put Their Heads Together at a Party

By RUTH MILLET
Times Special Writer

WHEN TWO WOMEN find themselves side by side at a party—and nothing to be done about it but to entertain each other—the conversation usually follows this pattern:

One pays the other a compliment in a light, careless voice not meant to carry conviction. "What a lovely hat."

Then the two feel called upon to exchange grievances. One tells how she spent the day supervising painters and what a horrible job it was, and the other tells how she simply melted getting a permanent and sitting under a dryer.

This exchange of grievances is, absolutely essential. If either woman let on that life was lovely, the other would resent her apparent contentment.

Then each makes a comment on the hostess' decorating job. At first, both agree that it is "effective," but they work around to agreeing that they don't believe THEY could live with it.

Now they are ready to get down to the business of finding out what the other one knows. So one begins by saying, "By the way, have you seen so-and-so lately? I heard that she..."

And they're off. Sometimes they spend half an hour or forty-five minutes on just one person. And sometimes the gossip isn't that good, and they have to keep bringing up new names, until they have gone over their list of mutual acquaintances.

THAT DONE with, they're willing to spend a little time on each other, and so they ask polite questions about each other's families and say "How nice" to what is supposed to be good news and shake their heads over the bad (while looking out of the corners of their eyes to make sure they aren't missing anything that is going on around them).

Then they take leave of each other, with one saying, "DO come by to see me sometime" and the other saying, "Thank you, I will," without the slightest intention of doing so.

And they say good-by knowing each other as well as they ever want to know each other—though if asked, each would probably say of the other: "Yes, she's a good friend of mine."
