Increase of Magnesium Output Hints at U. S. Use of Incendiaries

By DAVID DIETZ
Scripps-Howard Science Editor
The nation's war program now calls for production of 550,000,000 pounds of magnesium a year. Prior to Pearl Harbor, arrangements had been made to increase production to 400,000,000 pounds. Now it has been stepped up by 150,000,000 pounds.

To date, our chief use of magnesium has been in alloys for use in airplane construction. But it is well known that Germany has been using large quantities of magnesium in incendiary bombs.

It is certain that the Germans know nothing about the manufacture of such bombs that has not been long known to our own experts. One might venture a guess, therefore, about the increase in magnesium production.

The trend in the use of magnesium thus returns in the direction of the original uses of this metal. Magnesium is a very light, whitish metal. Thin ribbons of it burn easily, with an intense white flame. Twenty years ago the chief use of this metal was in the manufacture of photographers' flashlight powder and fireworks.

There are two general uses for magnesium in the aircraft industry. First, the metal is used as an alloying agent in the production of the hard aluminum alloys. Next, large amounts are used in the so-called magnesium base alloys. These are more than 90 per cent magnesium and are of particular value in making engine parts.

Magnesium is much lighter than aluminum. The specific gravity of aluminum is 2.70, that of magnesium, 1.74. There is no possibility of a shortage of magnesium in this country. Not only are ore deposits plentiful but within the last year the Dow Chemical Co. has perfected means of extracting magnesium from seawater.

The American Chemical Society cites the growth of facilities for the production of magnesium as a typical example of how war needs are being met. It points out that the Dow Chemical Co. expanded its capacity six-fold in two years. At this point the government entered the picture and the Defense Plant Corp. contracted for an additional expansion of 200 per cent. Other government-financed plants have also been contracted for. The result is that after private capital had built up the existing industry to 600 per cent of its original size, the government stepped in and with public financing multiplied this figure by 10.
