Elephant, Now Old and Crotchety, Doomed; Menace to Young Friends, Says Keeper

KANSAS CITY, Mo., May 22 (U. P.)—Temple, the 5000-pound elephant who was scheduled to die because she got crotchety and vicious with age, got a reprieve of a week yesterday when Zoo-Keeper William T. A. Cully was called out of the city. Mr. Cully, who recommended to the park board that Temple be given a painless death, went to his home in New York to attend the funeral of his father. He said that she would have to die because thousands of boys and girls in Kansas City loved her so much that he feared for their safety.

There was a time when Temple was as gentle as a kitten and it was great sport for the youngsters to hand her peanuts and other pachyderm tid-bits. That was before she got old and crotchety.

For some reason or other she developed what Cully calls a "mean streak" two years ago. She became progressively harder to get along with as time went on. Finally she attacked her companion Ararat and injured his tusks. Cully isolated her but last Sunday she bore down with her trunk and nearly felled a keeper, who escaped being crushed only because he was aware of her bad temper.

Park officials planned to build her a stronger home where she would have been encased in steel or reinforced concrete, but homes for elephants had a priority rating of near zero with the war production board, so that project had to be abandoned.
