

JANE JORDAN

DEAR JANE JORDAN—I have been married two years and have a son less than a year old. My husband is in service, still in the states. We have had no life together, even though we were married four months before he entered the service. After I was married I met a wonderful fellow who is now overseas. He writes me how much he loves me and I know that I love him. Is his love part puppy love? Is he just lonesome, or is he giving me a line? My husband doesn't know how I feel toward the other fellow. Shall I tell him? All three of us are still under voting age; so you can see how difficult it is for me to make my own decision.

BARBARA.

Answer—You haven't given your marriage a chance. If, of course, is not your fault or your husband's that you have not lived together. Nevertheless, since you have a child, you should not discard his father so readily for a young man overseas who may not feel the same when he returns. Besides, you may change your mind about him, too. Doesn't your husband deserve a chance to make a home for you and the baby before you make such a drastic decision against him?

Your letter is the most powerful argument I know against youthful marriages, especially when the young husband has to leave for the service before he has established any ties to his wife strong enough to hold in his absence. The girl who is still in the dating stage readily replaces him with another "date," but you can't discard a husband as easily as a suitor, especially when he is the father of your child. Barbara's letter should give a good reason for waiting to "One Much in Love" who is only 16 but
