Woman's Tip Leads to Arrest Of Hunted Forgery Suspect

Police Sgt. Alexander Dunwoody, whose single-handed campaign ended smoking on streets last year, was back in the news today.

Last night the sergeant and a couple of his men were sipping coffee in a restaurant in the northeast section of the city when he overheard a woman customer tell the waitress that she worked at 1108 Broadway.

Dunwoody's ears perked up. "That's where Paul Collins used to live, isn't it?" asked Dunwoody. Collins is a check artist, wanted by local police and the FBI who trailed him as far as Montana and Idaho recently then lost him.

"Sure is," said the woman, "in fact he is sleeping there right now." Dunwoody notified headquarters and police surrounded the house. They captured Collins, 23, on the roof in his pajamas.

Specifically he is accused of stealing L. G. S. Spring Clutch Corp. blank check checks, then filling them in for various amounts and forging the name of the company treasurer. He cashed a dozen of these checks, police said. He is charged with forgery.
