

SAYS U.S.-RUSS TIES IMPROVING

Ohio Solon Sees Better Understanding.

(Rep. Frances P. Bolton, (R. Ohio), tells of her impressions of Soviet-American relations in the following dispatch written for the United Press.)

By FRANCES P. BOLTON
MOSCOW, Sept. 9 (Delayed)—In the course of a fortnight's observation of Soviet-American relations in Berlin, Moscow, and Leningrad I found increasing good will and understanding, auguring well for the future of both countries.

I was particularly impressed with the smooth collaboration of the Americans and Russians on the allied control council in Berlin, where I found our men steadily developing an appreciation and good feeling for the Russians.

Americans in top positions in Berlin told me of the rapid elimination of initial misunderstandings which achieved an accord on basic as well as routine problems.

Observed Several Phases
Maj. Kennan C. Bolton, for instance, found the Russians delightful co-workers. On the Russian side I had occasion to speak with officials and ordinary citizens, engineers, workers, teachers, and collective farmers. I found an unusual sympathy for the Americans, and a great eagerness to learn more about us.

The Russians are big-hearted, frank, extrovert people possessing much in common with Americans. They are enthusiastic, alert and anxious to learn whatever possible from America.

I have seen an example of their sense of sportsmanship following the recent Soviet-American radio chess match. In private as well as in public utterances, the Russian winners did their utmost to explain the fortuitous circumstances of their victory. Without boasting of their success, they praised the competence and skill of the American team, and expressed confidence and hope that the Americans will do considerably better the next time.

Rebuild Leningrad
In Leningrad we saw Russians laboring to reconstruct the devastated section of the city. There was plenty of evidence of the extraordinary defense they put up during the siege. If they apply the same zeal and self-sacrifice to reconstruction, it should not take long to rebuild their avenue of the north.

The devastated outskirts of Leningrad reminded me of Warsaw, whose ruins are worse than any I have seen. Looking out of a window of the Hotel Polonia—one of the handful of buildings still standing because the Germans used it until the last minute—I saw thousands of persons emerging from cellars. They carried sacks and bundles on their shoulders, apparently things to sell.

Warsaw is infinitely more devastated than Berlin. But unlike Berlin, where the Russians did a fine job of making the Germans clean up the city, Warsaw is still full of rubble and debris. Despite the unexampled tragedy, the Poles walk erect, proud, smiling, determined and confident that they will see better times.

Faces Old Count Of Embezzling

EAST ST. LOUIS, Ill., Sept. 11 (U. P.)—James L. Parks, 67, a prosperous Magnolia, Del., businessman for the past 15 years, is slated for extradition here to face a 25-year-old embezzlement charge.

Parks, known in Magnolia as James L. Harris, was postmaster of Carbondale, Ill., from 1912 to 1918. He is charged with embezzlement of $3336 in world war I savings stamps during that period. The loss was discovered after he left office and an indictment against him was returned in East St. Louis.

Parks' neighbors in Magnolia knew him only as a wealthy poultry raiser, prominent in community affairs.

Escaped Policeman
They probably never dreamed that he was wanted for embezzlement and that authorities have not known his whereabouts since 1925 when he crashed through a train window to escape from the Chicago policeman who was returning him from Miami, Fla., to answer a charge of defrauding his fiancee.

The Chicago charge was placed against him in 1924 after he was alleged to have defrauded Miss May C. Llewellyn, Chicago school teacher, of her life savings, about $2000.

When arrested in Magnolia last Thursday, Parks said he had changed his name to Harris after playing a bit part in a motion picture. He posted $10,000 bond, taking the money from $50,000 in cash and securities he was carrying on his person.
