Teen Talk—Interior Decorator Tells Fundamentals

By BOBBIE SCHAEFFER INTERIOR DECORATING—it's an art and a career, but what does it take to break into the profession?

Teen-agers by the dozens aspire to becoming decorators—they should talk to an expert in the field. That helps them plan and prepare; to know better what they want.

MRS. MARK OGDEN, interior decorator at Adams, Inc., is such an expert. Ten years at the furniture mart have given Mrs. Ogden her background and as she describes her work, artistically minded teenagers will be intrigued. From the time she was 7 years old she ardently kept scrapbooks on architecture, home decorating, gardening and planning. She loved to sketch and later studied art at the John Herron Art school and with private teachers.

But art wasn't so practical a career, so she took an office job. During this time she studied various courses in night school. It was in a psychology course that she realized the value of self-analysis. She knew she wanted to create, to give beauty—and still support herself.

A correspondence course in interior decorating supplemented the practical knowledge she received when she started working at Adams' a decade ago. With constant study, her ability to draw, and evening courses she became qualified to become an interior decorator.

THAT'S the success story of one person, but behind it and behind every ambition for this career, is the desire, first of all, to incorporate beauty in all decorating. And with that desire comes the will to study and work hard. Also, there must be a solid technical background. Mrs. Ogden points out. One must know about periods, designers in those periods, fabrics, carpeting, lighting, walls and their treatment, window designing, and general design. A decorator must know color.

She, or he, must know pigments, how to combine colors, how to plan color schemes to achieve continuity and harmony, to lead one room into another. Color plays a very important role in one's life and moods.

This technical background should be obtained in a good school with a minimum of one and a half to two years continual study and, of course, psychology helps.

If one is financially unable to go to college, the correspondence courses offered are excellent. Mrs. Ogden feels, and will give diplomas with completion of the study.

Definitely an asset is the ability to sketch. New ideas can be put down so much more easily and the client sees before her what a room will look like.

Most all aspiring decorators start working in the drapery department, or one similar, of a furniture or department store.

Even with study, this practical experience of dealing with fabrics, furniture and design and watching the work of an expert decorator is the ideal way to work into the field, Mrs. Ogden stresses.

The psychology comes in before Mrs. Ogden decorates any home or room. She learns all about the client and her family. She wants to know their favorite colors, what kind of lives they lead, if they entertain a lot or read books at home each night. She must be sure of what they want and help them know what is right.
