

The Doctor Says— Operation May Be Needed To Close Artery After Birth

By WILLIAM A. O'BRIEN, M. D.

NEARLY SEVEN HUNDRED patients have been operated on because the connection between the aorta and the artery which carries blood to the lung failed to close after they were born.

Before birth, this connection, which leads from the heart, is important as it prevents an excess of blood from going through the lung where it is not needed. After birth the tube should close, but if it fails to do so it can be tied with a ligature, or cut.

Many patients with a persistent connection between the lung artery and the aorta do not complain of many symptoms, as they have no standard by which to judge their feelings. After the connection has been tied or cut, they uniformly report feeling much better.

THE TUBE should be operated on, even though there are no signs that the heart is being affected, because of the possibility of serious heart infections.

In infections of the lining membrane of the heart or of the tube between the vessels, tying the branch or cutting it often results in immediate disappearance of germs from the blood. This can be followed by treatment with penicillin and a cure of the infection is the usual result.

Persistent artery connections in children may be detected during the course of health examinations at school. The blood rushing through this channel makes a sound resembling a machine in operation. While other heart conditions can cause a similar noise, ways and means of distinguishing those which can be operated on have been developed.

Heart specialists recommend that adult patients who have this
