City People Found Not So 'Bad' as Country Cousins

States With Majority of Urban Dwellers Have Less Crime, 10-Year Survey Shows

By Science Service

FT. WORTH, Tex., Feb. 5—Country folks no longer need to fear the "wickedness" of the cities. Recent statistics show that states with the most city dwellers have less crime than do their country cousins.

This is one of the facts disclosed by a 10-year survey of crime reported by Dr. Austin L. Porterfield of Texas Christian University here. Crime declined during the war in a majority of the states. Dr. Porterfield has a simple explanation for that—a great many men of crime-committing age had gone to the war. When they returned, the crime rate in those states started climbing again.

But some parts of the country had more crime during the war

But Louisiana and North Carolina had lots of murders and aggravated assaults; the figures indicate, whereas Illinois and California did not have so much violence of this kind.

The difference, Dr. Porterfield believes, depends on the culture and also on circumstances. No one robs banks, he points out, where there are not banks to rob of the country.

Types of crime, as well as amount of crime, vary in different parts of the country. Illinois and California were found to be strong for robbery, both before the war and later. Louisiana and North Carolina, in contrast, had relatively few crimes of this type.
