New Anti-Germ Drug Polymyxin May Rival Famed Streptomycin

Test Bacillus-Type Chemical at Johns Hopkins; 'Gratifying' Results Are Reported

By JANE STAFFORD, Science Service Staff Writer

BALTIMORE, Mar. 9.—A new anti-germ chemical from a bacillus commonly found in soil and water that appears better than streptomycin and may replace it in treatment of some serious diseases is under trial at the Johns Hopkins Hospital here.

Polymyxin is the name of the new, "uniquely effective" antibiotic. It was discovered less than a year ago by two research teams working independently.

Dr. R. G. Benedict and A. F. Langley of the U. S. Department of Agriculture's northern regional research laboratory at Peoria, Ill., and Dr. Harold White and associates at the American Cyanamide Co.

A 6-week-old baby and his 13-month-old brother who were seriously ill with whooping cough are among the seven patients helped by polymyxin in its first trials. The little baby's temperature had reached 103 degrees Fahrenheit. Within one day after polymyxin was started, his temperature was normal.

An 11-month-old baby with a severe burn that became infected with the blue pus-forming germ, bacillus pyocyanus, had been given every other kind of treatment without effect. Within six days, polymyxin had cleared up the infection so the baby could have skin grafting done to replace the tissue destroyed by the burn.

Two units of polymyxin, the Hopkins scientists found, would stop the growth of a germ that 50 units of streptomycin did not stop.

Polymyxin is not, as far as is known, effective against tuberculosis germs against which streptomycin is powerful. But it is more effective than streptomycin against most gram negative germs.

Plague, undulant fever, typhus (rabbit fever), certain types of meningitis and of blood poisoning and wound infections, bacillary dysentery, typhoid and paratyphoid fevers and many types of urinary tract infection may be remedied by polymyxin, if it comes up to present expectations. The Hopkins scientists are continuing their studies and hope to try it on more patients with different ailments.
