Tighten Safety Measures Since Centralia Mine Blast

Federal Code Written Into Union Contracts;
Federal Probers Lack Power to Close Mines

By FRED W. PERKINS, Scripps-Howard Staff Writer
WASHINGTON, Apr. 1—Not much noticed, because of the current coal miners' strike, was the first anniversary of a tragic event in the coal industry.
It was on Mar. 25, 1947, that a mine near Centralia, Ill., blew up, killing 111 miners.
In the year that has gone by it is presumed that mine inspection, by both federal and state agencies, has been tightened. The federal mine safety code has been written into the union's contract with the coal operators. Congress has not acted on proposals by some of its members to give federal inspectors a power that is restricted to state inspectors—authority to close mines they deem unsafe.

There have been worse disasters in American mining history, but none in which it was easier to find the trail of official neglect and failure to enforce a fundamental rule of mine safety.

Senate Investigation
A committee in the Senate, headed by Sen. Guy Cordon (R. Ore.), went to Centralia and held hearings. This and other investigations proved that the cause was an over-abundance of coal dust which ignited and exploded.

in a manner never clearly determined. The important fact was that the old mine had been known to be dangerously "dusty" for years and not much had been done to remove the peril.
The standard method of preventing coal dust explosions is to spread rock dust over the layers of coal dust.
Rock dust had been used in the Centralia mine, but according to the evidence, so long ago that thick new layers of coal dust had been deposited, ready to be stirred up into the air by any disturbance, such as even the passage of mine cars.
State Politics Involved
The state mining department came out with its reputation most damaged among the several agencies that were involved. State politics was found to have something to do with the lack of attention to the Centralia mine, and the director of the mining department, Robert M. Medill, was removed.

Other agencies were involved, including the Federal Coal Mines Administration, then in possession of nearly all coal mines; the Centralia Coal Co., and even the United Mine Workers—the union of the miners led by John L. Lewis. Official reports place some of the blame on all of them.

HORSESHOEING OLD TRADE
Horsehoeing was introduced into England from Normandy in 1066 by William the Conqueror.
