Hoosier Granted Car Device Patent

WASHINGTON, Sept. 30 — Borrowing power from the engine to help with the steering when your car or truck is laboring through mud or loose sand is the basic idea of an invention on which U. S. Patent 2,450,126 has just been issued here to Delbert P. Fisher of South Bend, Ind.

As long as the going is good and the steering easy, the work is done by the driver alone, through the customary combination of steering-wheel, steering-arm and steering-rod.

The steering-rod, however, has an extension backward into a pneumatic cylinder, where it is connected to a piston. When steering becomes really hard labor, notice is automatically served on the pneumatic setup by the compression of a spring incorporated into the steering-rod assembly.

Compression of the spring opens a valve that makes demand for help on the engine, by way of the intake manifold. This sucks air out of the cylinder, so that the atmospheric pressure on the other side of the piston pushes it, giving the driver's steering efforts a substantial boost.

When he pulls the wheel over in the other direction, the suction pressure situation in the cylinder is automatically reversed, and again the piston pushes the steering-rod the way the driver wants it to go.

Rights in the patent have been assigned to the Bendix Corp.
