Federal Action Held Needed in Smog Menace

Might Avert New
Tragedy Like Donora's

By JANE STAFFORD
Science Service Medical Writer
WASHINGTON, Nov. 4.—Here's a national health protection job for the new Congress and the next administration: A clean-up of the air in industrial areas, so as to prevent another Donora tragedy in which industrial fumes held by fog, killed a score of persons and made many others ill.

The Donora town council has already requested Federal aid, and a U. S. Public Health Service expert will probably go to Donora today. But the Federal Health Service cannot move into such situations as rapidly as might be expected or be as helpful because it must wait for a request from state health departments.

In this instance, election day closing of state offices at Harrisburg, Pa., delayed by at least a day the aid the Federal Health Service can give.

Danger Over Now
The danger is over on Donora now that the fog has been dispelled, and the same combination of fog and no wind may not happen again in years. Even if it did, the health danger could be largely prevented if the industry spent a good deal of money to prevent release of dangerous fumes into the air.

Donora is not alone in its air pollution danger. Los Angeles residents go about with inflamed eyes and sore throats much of the time because of air pollution from the industries in and around the city. Other industrial regions face much the same problems.

St. Louis is a notable example of a city that cleaned up its air, with resultant health benefits to its citizens. But while many cities have ordinances for control of air pollution and for smoke abatement, almost no state has any such legislation.

The problem is big enough, in the opinion of Dr. J. G. Townsend, head of the industrial hygiene division of the U. S. Public Health Service, to warrant more attention on the Federal level.
