Naval 'Mama's' Hoochoos Leave Radio 'Baby' Cold

Pilotless Fighter 'Drone' Shoves Off
Without So Much as a Nod From 'Mother'

CHINCOTEAGUE NAVAL AIR BASE, Va., Dec. 2 (UP)—The Navy admitted today that it was licked by a baby from this bright, new radio-controlled atomic postwar age.

Search planes went out in a forlorn hunt from this Naval Air Station, but they didn't have much hope of finding baby in one piece. Baby was a radio-controlled pilotless fighter "drone" plane, which whizzed disobediently off toward Maryland yesterday, paying no attention to the frantic radio hoochoos sent out by its mother ship.

One minute the drone was sitting quietly on the airstrip where it was supposed to be. Capt. W.V. R. Vieweg, commander of the base, reported. Then without any radio command from its startled "mother," it suddenly roared down the strip under full throttle, rocketed up to 22,000 feet and bounced off among the clouds.

The heavy mother ship took off in pursuit, but its radio equipment kept it too far behind to have an effect on baby. Other radio-control planes joined the chase but baby continued to scoot heedlessly ahead.

Capt. Vieweg was sure baby had come down by now, probably to a good end. The drone carried enough fuel to last three hours in normal flight, he explained, but with its throttles wide open it would exhaust its tanks in 20 minutes.

The Navy officer said he was when baby came to earth—probably in the marshes near the coast, or else at sea, if it kept heading in the same direction.
