How to Play Canasta— Special Rules, 'Going Out' Discussed in New Card Game

By WILLIAM E. McKENNEY, America's Card Authority
Written by NEA Service

TODAY WE'LL DISCUSS "going out," and special rules of Canasta.

Stock pile exhausted: When a player draws the last card of the stock pile, various procedures of play follow:

If the card drawn is a red trey, he places it face up on the table, melds any of his cards that he desires, but does not discard, and the hand is over.

If he draws the last card of the stock pile and discards a black trey, a deuce or a joker, the hand is ended.

If he makes a regular discard other than a wild card or a black trey, the next player may take the discard pile if he can meld the up-card with two cards from his hand. If the pack is frozen, the rules governing the frozen pack prevail.

If the pack is not frozen, and the up-card can be added to one of his side's melds, he must take the pack. Play continues in this manner until a player legally refuses to take the up-card.

No Bonus

If no player melds out the score is tabulated in the regular manner, but neither side receives the bonus.

Special rules: A player may always combine two or more melds of the same rank made by his side, but may not withdraw any card from the meld. In other words, there is no "splitting a meld."

When a deuce or a joker is once played, it cannot be taken up again.

In other words, there is no trading for the joker or deuce. No meld can contain more than three wild cards unless it is a completed Canasta. You may continue adding cards to a completed Canasta indefinitely, even if there are then more than three wild cards in it.

Number of Cards

Two and three-handed Canasta: The best two-handed game of Canasta is to deal each player 15 cards. The rules of four-handed Canasta apply, except that it takes two Canastas to go out. In two-handed, the deal alternates.

For three-handed Canasta, deal 13 cards to each. Only one Canasta is required to go out, as in the four-handed game.

"It is customary at the end of each game to figure each side's score to the nearest hundred, 30 points or more counting at 100."

TOMORROW: Points from experience.

Hair Stylist Makes 1950 Prediction

"Our Lady of Paris" hair style by Marguerite E. Buck.

MOST hair stylists will tell you how you'll be wearing your hair in the near future, but Mme. Marguerite E. Buck of New York goes them one better and predicts how you'll be wearing it next year.

Mme. Buck, stylist for national and international advertising accounts, must think at least a half-year ahead in coiffure designs. An advertising photo taken now will, in all probability, appear in a magazine several months from now. It is part of Mme. Buck's job, as president of the Fashion Futures hair styling service, to develop coiffures which will be in style when such photos appear.

Returning recently from Paris, Mme. Buck said, "The 1950 hair style trend in America will definitely be from two to six inches."

"SIMPLICITY, charm and femininity will keynote smart chignon lines, small heads and varieties of personalized styles dressed with short hair that looks long and vice versa."

An example of the simple and feminine hairdo she expects to be popular is shown. Her "Our Lady of Paris" coiffure (shown above in two views) was designed to accompany new Paris costume designs.

"The styles created by the legendary Parisian couturiers for the coming season will influence American fashion," Mme. Buck said.

"But America has always led the world in hair styling," she added. "French style in costumes may influence America, but American hair styling has influenced France. We will see a continued trend in this direction as our 1950 hair styles are dressed with hair from two to six inches long."

In her work with Fashion Futures, Mme. Buck trains and advises operators in beauty salons throughout the country. She has made several trips here to work with the staff of Ayres' beauty salon.—By L. F.
