Your Marriage: By Samuel and Esther Kling— Poorly Adjusted Marriage Tends to Foster Infidelity

Q—Why do married people develop a physical interest in someone other than their mate?
A—Chiefly because of a lack of good adjustment within the marriage.

The partners may have a poor physical relationship, or there may be trouble along other lines. Satisfaction in marriage is due to a combination of sexual and non-sexual factors—because they're really inseparable.

Those who don't get along sexually, usually don't get along well in other aspects of the marriage. And where there's continued disharmony in other areas, the intimate side of the couple's relationship suffers. Wherever there's dissatisfaction, the partners become more susceptible to temptation from other sources.

Again, some married people develop a physical interest in a third party because of their own personality defects. These are the people who generally fit from one affair to another.

Some feel inferior and insecure—perhaps they've felt that way from childhood on—and seek reassurance of their attractiveness in extra-marital conquests. Some readily succumb because of a personality weakness which lowers their resistance to anything having strong physical appeal.

Boredom is still another reason why mates become attracted to someone else. Those who have few interests—who don't keep busy with satisfying activities—are likely to place greater emphasis on the physical and to be more easily distracted by someone who is physically attractive.

Q—What else must be taken into consideration?

A—The sex urge itself. The truth is a person can be happily married and yet find himself or herself strongly drawn to another member of the opposite sex. Indeed, where this appeal is strong enough, it sometimes makes the individual forget all other considerations. He may succumb to it and then regret it later when he finds it wasn't really love at all, but merely physical attraction.

Of course, where a partner is happily married and has strength of character, he's far less likely to yield to his feeling for another person. He'll avoid that individual so that his attachment has no chance to become stronger.

Knowing the most common reasons for extra-marital physical interest may help you prevent such a situation from arising in your marriage. If you try to overcome any barriers to a good adjustment within the marriage, if you develop new interests to keep the relationship alive, and if you do what you can—even if you need professional help—to overcome strong personality defects, you're certainly reducing the risks.
