Ill-Tempered, Nagging Wife Recognizes Her Faults After Divorce

DEAR MRS. MANNERS:

I THOUGHT divorce would prove to the world how right I was—how wrong my husband was. It didn't work that way. It showed me, in my loneliness since divorce, how wrong I was many times—how I enjoyed suffering. Divorce took away the self-confidence I felt as a happy bride—happy because I tried to please my husband.

I honestly believe my husband stayed with me as long as he did because he felt sorry for me and thought I needed him. When my nagging and temper convinced him that nothing would help—that I didn't want to be helped—he left.

Ladies, when you don't do anything to make your husband happy and act happy married to him, you're apt to end without a husband as I did. Then you'll learn just what kind of woman you are. The realization isn't pleasant, I know.

HOOPER READER.

The woman who thinks her husband will ignore or endure her nagging and bossing without outbreak and stick around faithfully because of their sacred vows is taking a chance, isn't she? His conscience doesn't bother him much if he sleeps out when he feels he is mistreated. He can't quite understand the woman who overlooked his faults or made him think he didn't have many before they married. He tried to live up to her opinion then. When she changes that opinion, he usually lives up to the new one, too.

A man is usually looking for a home. He still hunts when he's unhappily married. It takes several mistakes to make him give up the idea completely.

Grooming Is Important

MANY a gal weeps on my shoulder over a year's time for I'm a counselor in a big office—a kind of social worker coming up through the ranks. The letter by the girl worrying about her untidy friend reminded me of one of our girls.

Linda (that's not her real name, of course) won everybody. Though her appearance wasn't top-notch the day she got her job, she charmed the personnel department. She grew more and more unkempt.

Despite her untidiness one of our attractive men got interested in her. In a few months he walked out on her. About the same time the office manager told me to "get that girl cleaned up" or he'd fire her.

Linda told me, in a deluge of tears, that the man she loved accused her of being dirty. Then I had to tell her the same thing, urged by the office manager. She became defiant and said she was as clean as anybody, but that week she quit.

I haven't heard from her since. It gives me a feeling of chagrin that I didn't try to help her organize her grooming routine. If open, it's tempting to overlook bad grooming and think "I'll get by." Then the sun shines brightly, people call unexpectedly for social dates, and working late prevents going home to change. A wrong impression is made—a friendship marred, a romance missed.

COUNSELOR.

Fresh out of bed, with one eye

Look at your reflection in a store window in broad daylight—look bravely at the unpressed skirt with the zipper off the track, the buttonless blouse with gleaming safety pins and tall flapping, the fighting colors, the unshined shoes, the sagging slip with twisted straps, crooked hose seams, straggling hair, absence of make-up, bad posture and sour expression. Especially notice the dirty neck. A new costume won't make up for bad grooming. It takes a lot of effort and scrutiny every day. You've heard the old saying by women urging youngsters to start clean—"What if you should be in an accident?" Would you want anyone to know how untidy you know you are?

Discover $14,512 on Hospitalized Bricklayer

BOSTON, (UP)—When Philip Greenberg, a bricklayer, was brought into a hospital after a tumble from a staging he looked to nurses like a poor working man.

But when they peeled his clothes off to treat his back injuries they discovered $14,512 in cash in his pocket. Mr. Greenberg explained he was carrying the money in the hope of getting to the bank during his lunch hour.
