AMA Not Ready to Report On Value of Antihistamine

Council Says Further Study Needed but
Condemns Drug's Advertising Matter

By LARRY PIPER

What about the antihistamine drugs, now flooding drug store counters and being widely advertised as the conqueror of the common cold?

Millions of Americans, who sneeze, sniff and suffer through 400 colds a year, want to know if the antihistamines will end their misery.

The American Medical Association wanted to know, too, so it delegated its Council on Pharmacy and Chemistry to find out.

The council's findings announced today:

"Until a scientifically acceptable study is performed, the true effectiveness of the antihistamine drugs in the control of the common cold cannot be evaluated."

The warning goes on: "With over-the-counter sale, careless and habitual use of the antihistamines may be expected and the medical profession should anticipate similar serious reactions."

But will the antihistamines now on the market safely cure your sniffles?

The AMA isn't yet ready to say.
