The Wounded Don't Cry—Victims Have Better Chance of Survival In Korean Fighting

Medical Airlift Doing Wonderful Job In Conflict Called Toughest of All

By HARRY PRESS, Times Special Writer
SOMEWHERE IN KOREA, Oct. 6.—The Korean fighting, say veterans who have lived through other wars, is tougher than anything they've seen. But in one respect the soldier is getting a break—if he is wounded, his chances of survival are better.

Primarily because of the airlift for wounded, the death rate among patients admitted to the hospital in Korea is believed to be the lowest for any war in this country's history.

A unification of effort, between the Medical Corps and the Military Air Transport Service, is responsible for that record. MATS' planes, used to bring supplies to Korea in the airlift from California, are transformed into flying ambulances when the cargo is unloaded.

The real story of the medical airlift, and how it helps save lives, begins on Hill 201, along the Nakdong River, on South Mountain in Seoul, or anywhere American troops are fighting.

How It Works
A man is shot, or a mortar blast falls him, or a grenade rolls into his foxhole and explodes. Then an aid man, such as Sgt. Robert Cordoba, goes to work. Listen to his company commander, Lt. Nicholas Gombos, of Bakersfield, Calif., talk with pride:

"Sometimes I think that Cordoba doesn't care what happens to himself. I've seen him crawl under enemy machine guns, and he'd get to the top of the hill to protect him, give him first aid, and then believe it or not, he'd stick around long enough to make out the medical tag and tie it to the man's uniform. Then he'd drag him down to safety."

Allover Korea, medical men like Robert Cordoba are "thinkers" of others first, and many of them are getting wounded themselves. Doctors give the man emergency treatment—pain-killers and especially the fabulous new antibiotics to halt infection—then begin the long, agonizingly slow trip, in an ambulance, truck or jeep, over tortuous mountain dirt roads so narrow that traffic can go only one way.

Koreans Help
Korean boys, aided by enlisted men, carry in the litter and dump them on the wooden floor, damped and to keep down dust. Tags are quickly examined, in the dim light, to determine priority of treatment. The most urgent cases are carried into an operating room set up between blackboards in what was once a fourth-grade classroom.
