

nonsense and priestcraft, and that it was of no consequence except that it sometimes helped a man to carry his purposes in the world. Mr. B. W. would doubtless say that to support such a man would be inconsistent, yet inconsistent as it may appear, teachers of Christianity and professors of religion have exerted their utmost endeavor to support such a character, I would now quote a passage which says "thou*that preachest do not steal, dost thou steal?" for the perusal of those that have raised such a hue and cry against SIMON MAGGUS.

Brattleboro', Vermont, Feb. 18.
Last Friday evening some of the inhabitants of this village were alarmed by a shock, which was supposed to be an earthquake. It was accompanied with a heavy sound like the report of cannon at a distance. The shock was sensibly felt by movable things, particularly crockery and other light articles. It proved however, to be merely a common result of such extremely cold weather as we have experienced for a few days past; as on the morning following, a fissure was discovered in the surface of the frozen earth about half an inch in its greatest width, passing diagonally from the house of John Holbrook esq. across main street, to the bank of Connecticut river.

MADISON,

SATURDAY, MARCH 22, 1817.

Since the publication of our last number, the rev. Mr. Whitton called at our office and we had some conversation on the subject of his epistle that we had published,—he said we had entirely misconstrued him in that part which went to implicate us; that it was only intended as a hint to us that we ought to, or might make some apology for printing a piece so derogatory to religion as the piece written by Simon Maggus. This being the case, we certainly regret that he had not have expressed it in plainer words. Indeed it is to be lamented that we were not made acquainted with some circumstances attending the case; for then we would have been saved from the disagreeable task of making such remarks as we did,—For most certainly nothing could be more foreign to our intentions, than that of injuring the cause of vital religion; yet we like other imperfect beings, are liable to err, and as Simon has again employed his pen and who in this day's paper declares himself a friend to vital religion, and asks pardon of all the sincere persons whom he may have injured, perhaps a sufficient reason to convince the real christian that Simon and the editor are both friendly to religion.

Doct. Oglesby called upon us yesterday and asserts that the report which has been in circulation relative to their having been a caucus at his house, is false; and that he verily believes that the report originated for the purpose of injuring his character, and that he can make it appear that the report is false by the testimony of several persons.

Mr. H. further informs, that Mr. Mead, our late consul, who had been so long imprisoned, was to be released the day after he sailed.

There had been no late news from our squadron. It was understood that the frigate U. States, and sloop of war Ontario, were at Malaga, and the rest of the squadron at Port Mahon, &c. on their way to Algiers.

The Spanish expedition intended, long since, to have been sent against the Patriots, was still in status quo.

On the coast, capt. Babson spoke a ship from New York for Demarara, and the brig Louisa, 22 days from Turks Island for Baltimore.
