Annual Visit of Mrs. Sarah Dittmer Recalls Her Experiences When She Sympathized With Boys in Gray and Her Son Donned the Uniform of Blue

More than eighty years old, Mrs. Sarah Dittmer, of Savannah, Ga., is in Hammond on her annual visit during the summer months, spending her time with her grandson, Col. LeGrand T. Meyer and his family at 47 Doty street.

Although born and reared in the South and loyal to all of its ideals, Lake County nevertheless lays a permanent and seventeen years old respectively, were attending the Valparaiso university, which was then a denominational school, and it was while the boys were at school that the mother, fearing that her oldest son might be drafted, tore the record from the family bible so as to destroy the record of his age, and it was then that Charles, the younger one, moved by the spirit of war, ran away from school and went to Chicago to enlist.

He was a conscientious chap and mindful of what his mother had taught him about taking an oath. So when his turn came to swear to his age he swore: "I am now standing over eighteen," he having written the figures on two pieces of paper and placed them in his shoes. The father, having learned of his hopeful patriotism set out for Chicago where the boy had enlisted in order to bring him back, but the Ninth Illinois Cavalry, Co. C, of which he was a member, was already on the march toward the South. The parent followed as far south as Cairo and missing him there he gave up the chase. Charles served through the war and was discharged with honor. His parents being from the South heard the news of their nephews down there losing their lives for the southern cause and with each message their feeling for the South grew. Thus the mother spent the years of war, her own heart bleeding for the South and her own boy in the blue uniform fighting against his cousins. It was only one of the many heart-breaking dramas of the war.

Son Returns From War.

One day the son came home, a youth in years but a father in appearance. The father in a fatherly fashion received him with a stern men and only after the mother had cried her well come on her hero's shoulder, did the father hold out his hand to him.

Work on the farm at Cedar Lake was resumed and in 1837 the family moved back to Savannah again. Henry Dittmer died there and the children were married and moved to different parts of the country. While living in the north one of the daughters met John Meyer whom she married and with whom she occupied the Dittmer homestead. Although her husband is dead she still continues to live at Cedar Lake. Charles Dittmer moved to Oklahoma City where he is living now.

Henry Dittmer located in Chicago and is still there, while Jennie, one of the two daughters, married Clark Farwell and now lives with her family at Loel.

It is through Mrs. Dittmer's lineage that Colonel Meyer traces his ancestry to the revolutionary war and that he established his claim as a son of the revolution.

Mrs. Dittmer makes annual visits to Lake county and spends summer months in the cooler climate. She is hale and hearty and has made many friends in Hammond who are glad to have her here again for a visit.

Some sagacious business men put in an advertisement in a paper and expect it to bring them results—as well expect to eat one meal and then keep from being hungry for a week. Sometimes it will—more often it won't.
