"Christ called men unto a life of whiteness and beauty because all bore the image of God. The stamp of divinity man carries puts him under a solemn pledge to avoid the stamp of demerit. The motive to duty is fidelity to what man is fundamentally and constitutionally, through his original endowment of mind and heart. Men may think to escape the obligations of a Christian life by refusing to pledge themselves to a church, but Christ affirmed that man is pledged to a life of integrity by virtue of what he received in birth gifts."

FADS AND FASHIONS

New York, Oct. 17.—Women, especially young women, who like to dress becomingly and yet be in style, will be glad to hear that the jumper in a modified form, will be fashionable again this season. It is apparent from some of the French models recently imported and is prettier than ever in its present form. It is attached to the skirt of the three-piece suit. The waist line is moved up three inches from the normal, the skirt is cut on a close circular in two or four gores, and the straight line down front and back is emphasized by two bands of wide embroidery or braid, and is made with wide shoulder pieces, usually covered with three shaped flounces, and has a three-inch cap following a pear-shaped armhole.

This arrangement is worn over an elaborate guimpe of Turkish, Irish or flax lace run with silver or gold thread. When the color of the material will permit, flax net is used instead of lace, and is heavily darned in and out with Persian colored flows. In either case the sleeves extend down to the knuckles and fit the arm closely. They fasten from elbow to wrist with any fancy little buttons that can be picked up. Over this frock goes a coat in the Directoire style, loose enough not to crush the gown, but slender enough to be graceful and fashionable.

A handsome model of that kind was of gray green Liberty broadcloth with a clinging high-waisted skirt, with two rows of wide black silk braid down the front and back. The jumper, which was only a small affair, was attached to the skirt just below the bust and went over the shoulders in wide brettelette shape with wide cap sleeves. It was edged with wide silk and finished at the back with a bow and a green enameled buckle. The coat for this suit was long, quite flat and straight in its lines, and was cut into a deep pointed scallop at center, back and front, and at each side. It came to within twenty inches of the ground. Braid was also used on the coat, running in two straight lines from shoulder to hem. The collar was a wide turnover one cut to triple points and made of black satin. There were no cuffs and the long sleeves were shaped to points over the hands and edged with black braid.

Many of the newest fall dresses show a touch of trimming or piping of checked material. A handsome dress shown in a fashionable shop, for instance, was beautifully trimmed with a tiny piping of black and white checked serge. Another dress of plain material was handsomely trimmed with bands of checked taffeta. Even in a comparatively old-fashioned dress a new and modish effect may be produced by such a touch in the trimming, which brightens the whole and adds to its attractiveness.

In the trousseau prepared for Miss Hozer, who was married to Mr. Winston Churchill a short time ago, empire modes and directoire lines were about evenly divided. An empire tea gown was fashioned of white silk-voile over white satin, beauty of line and costly simplicity, making the gown beautiful. A white nixon desole reception gown of the directoire type was also made over white satin and was absolutely devoid of decoration. A black satin evening gown was also without decoration and depended solely on beauty of material and grace of line for its becomingness. The trousseau included three handsome evening cloaks, all of empire style, with mod-
