Some of the Schools at Salem

(By Clinton Gardner.)

Of course this article will consist largely of personal experiences, but we hope to be able to interest you in some small fashion. The first school I ever attended was in 1850—gee whiz, but that is a long time ago!—and was in a school building afterwards bought by the United Brethren and used as a church and called "The Chapel." It was taught by Samuel Maxwell, who took photography, and some of the shadows in this part were taken by him and are still kept and prized highly by the owners.

In 1851 the Quakers, who had a large membership at Salem and were always interested in educational matters, considered building a school house, so after obtaining the land of William Beard, grandfather of Oscar, Alonzo, Allen and Elihu Beard, they made an agreement as follows:

Article of agreement entered into this nineteenth day of the fourth month in the year of our Lord, 1851, between Jesse Cook, of the county of Union and state of Indiana, of the one part, and the undersigned trustees appointed by the Salem monthly meeting of the Friends to superintend the erection of a school house to be under the care and control of said meeting of the county and state aforesaid of the other part, description following, to-wit: A one-story frame building, 10 ft. in height inside in the clear, 30 ft. long, and 24 ft. wide, partitioned so as to form an entry 6 ft. wide at the end, etc., etc. The trustees to pay said Jesse Cook as a compensation for his services and expenses the sum of $255.00 on or before the 15th of the first month next. And as a further confirmation of said agreement, the parties have severally set their hands at the date above written.

JESSE COOK.

Jabez Talbert,
David Huddleston, Trustees.

The first school was taught in the new school house by Lydia Davis, and if my memory serves me correctly was a summer school. The following winter a school was taught at the new school house by William Maughton, a stern old Irish Quaker, who was an excellent teacher for that period, but of an irascible temper. One of his peculiarities was throwing missiles at unruly scholars—a book, slate, or whatever was the handiest to pick up. The atmosphere was not congenial for yours truly, so at the end of the first day my books were carried home and stayed. Will Barnard had a desk near an open window and one day when the teacher threw some article at a scholar, Will took his first chance and slid out of the window and went home, but came back afterwards. The next school at Salem was taught by Rhoda Macy, a daughter of John M. Macy, who was a teacher in another school house many years before this, which stood north of the Friends church. Our next teacher was Mary Way, who taught for two terms. After that, we had a teacher named Robert Fisher for one term. John C. Johnson followed with one term. About this time my scholarship was transferred to Cottage Grove school, where I went for two winters, and after that a new school house was built at Pleasant Hill, in 1859, so my school days at Salem were ended.

I do not suppose I can give the names of all the teachers who taught following schools at this place but will give them as near as possible. David Ellis taught one term, Rachel Way one term, Esther Gordon one term, Elizabeth Maxwell one term, Isabella Gardner one term, Jerusha Swain one term, Emeline Talbert one term, Lydia Talbert one term. Some of these were summer schools.

Salem school was governed for many years by the Friends, who at this time held meetings every week on fourth days (Wednesdays) and they requested and expected the scholars who were attending this school to be lined up and marched over to a "silent meeting" escorted by the teacher. Such meetings lasted an hour, and never a word was spoken, so you can see it was irksome to a lot of small scholars. As the years passed a more liberal spirit crept into the church so they ruled that those who wanted to go should do so and those who did not wish to go could stay and study, under the supervision of one of the older scholars. Our games at noontime and recess were chiefly ball games. Town ball, a game similar to baseball, but not so dangerous, as we had no broken fingers nor eyes knocked out. Cat ball, bat ball and "Anthony over" were much in vogue. When all took part we had blackman, skip the rope, snowballing, skating on a pond near the school house.

This article covers the history of Salem school in a way until about 1864, when someone else will take it up for the later schools.

CENTENNIAL MOVIES

Scenario of Historical Films of Indiana Approved.

The Indiana Historical Commission has formally endorsed the scenario submitted by the Selig Polyscope Company for the Centennial historical picture of Indiana. The work of making the picture is already under way. The production will require 7,000 feet of film, or seven reels. Two reels will be devoted to a prologue depicting the early history of the state. Five reels cover the centennial period from 1816 to the present.

Location men in the employ of the Selig Polyscope Company are busy touring the state in search for ideal "locations" for the staging of the film. The "location" experts have the task of arranging 300 scenes covering a period of 236 years.

The Selig Company is arranging to re-enact the scenes on the identical grounds where they occurred. The battle of Tippecanoe, for example, will be staged at Battle Ground, in Tippecanoe county, and the landing of LaSalle at the St. Joseph-Kankakee portage and his embarkation on the Kankakee will be staged near South Bend.

The scenario for the production, written by Gillson Willetts, of Chicago, provides that where original buildings are not available, new ones are to be erected. The costuming of the production in itself will be an important undertaking, as the wardrobe must be accurate to the last detail. The weapons used in the various battle scenes also must be historically accurate.

The cast for the production, which at times will number over 1,000 persons, must visit all the various scenes, as the scenario necessitates the taking of pictures in the extreme northern section and the extreme southern part of the state.
