A good story is told on a former well known Remington citizen, who is now an honored resident of this place. While living at Remington, he took a pedestrian trip to the country, and on the return trip when about three miles from town, weary and aching with his wonted exertions, was overtaken by a prominent woman of Remington, who was driving alone in a phaeton. Accosting him pleasantly, she said, "are you tired walking?" Anxious to appear unconcerned, that she might not see how eager he was to plant his form beside her, he replied a little stiffly: "Well—er—no, not very." "Ah," she sweetly said, "I thought if you was you might run a little," and drove royally by. He got so mad that his hair turned white before he got to town, and it is that way yet.—Goodland Herald.
