

A RAT IN A PECULIARLY PERPLEXING PREDICAMENT.—An exciting scene was witnessed in a street car near Willard's this forenoon. A lady, well dressed and of genteel and respectable appearance stepped into the car from the Fourteenth street crossing, and upon taking her seat seemed to receive a momentary shock.—She did not lose her presence of mind, however, but seized with energy a portion of her apparel on one side of her lap, and called the conductor. That official approached, when the lady coolly said to him: "There is something under my dress which is alive, please to grasp it hard just where I have hold of it." The conductor did so, and felt a living animal, which he choked with his fist till it was paralyzed. The lady meanwhile, putting her hands under her dress pulled forth a good sized rat, whose violent career was soon permanently ended with a few blows from the butt end of the driver's whip. The impatient beast was cast into the highway, and the horse car went on its way rejoicing, the passengers being divided in opinion as to whether the rat was a resident of Willard's Hotel or the ears of the Washington and Georgetown Railroad.—[Washington Republican.]

A printer on his death couch and about to take an affectionate farewell of his weeping friends observed: "I have finished my 'take,' the galley is 'proved,' and the great Proof Reader of the Universe has marked the errors; let Death take the 'slugs' out, and I am ready for the 'hell box.'"

To live and die happy, take your country paper, and pay for it.

Longfellow, the poet, has an income of $14,000. That long fellow will never be short.

Miss Dobbs says the sweetest line she ever read was her Simon's name written in molasses on the front porch.

A paper in southern Illinois tells of a young woman who appeared before a magistrate the day after her marriage, and complained that her husband had been "taking liberties with her."

It seems singular that the Episcopal Convention which has been continually making errors shall object to clergymen bearing arms.

Leurgans asks what material makes the best comforters. We don't know, being inexperienced in such matters; but refer you to the report of a committee of some county fair, who put it in this way: "Best bed comforter—Miss Mary Hall." You should address the young lady at once.
