WHEAT IS QUOTED
ON LOCAL MARKET
AT FANCY FIGURE

Ninety-five Cents Per Bushel Is Being Offered at This Time for the Product of Wayne County Farms.

IS THE HIGHEST PRICE
PAID IN EIGHT YEARS.

It is Not Believed the Price Will Go Beyond This and Much Unloading Is Expected Before the Break.

Not since the famous Leiter wheat speculation in Chicago, eight years ago, has the price of wheat been as high on the local markets as at the present time, caused by the speculation in the Chicago grain pit. Local millers are now paying ninety-five cents for wheat, but according to Charles J. Carpenter, of the Richmond Roller Mills, the present quotations will hardly reach a much higher figure as the conditions surrounding the present wheat battle, are not like those which surrounded the great Leiter squeeze. At that time there was a foreign or export demand for wheat far above the $1 figure, while at present the quotations have passed those offered by foreign markets. It is for this reason that Mr. Carpenter thinks the present high prices cannot continue. At the time of the great Leiter squeeze in Chicago, local millers paid $1.45 per bushel for wheat, but there are no chances for the same figure now.

Mr. Carpenter has been in the milling business for thirty-two years, and in that time he says the quotations on wheat has increased over the $1.00 mark, but six times. It has been due to speculation in the big markets.

Wayne county farmers who are so fortunate as to hold several hundred bushels of grain, are pleased, but are waiting for still higher quotations on the cereal. Many of them have refused to sell, thinking that wheat would go up. They are refusing to sell at the present time, even though a fancy figure is being paid. Many however, will dispose of their holdings if the market shows the first sign of breaking.

Relief From Rheumatic Pains.

"I suffered with rheumatism for over two years," says Mr. Rolland Curry, a patrolman at Key West, Fla., "Sometimes it settled in my knees and lamed me so I could hardly walk, at other times it would be in my feet and hands so I was incapacitated for duty. One night when I was in severe pain and lame from it my wife went to the drug store here and came back with a bottle of Chamberlain's Pain Balm. I was rubbed with it and found the pain had nearly gone during the night. I kept on using it for a little more than two weeks and found that it drove the rheumatism away. I have not had any trouble from that disease for over three months." For sale by A. G. Lukens & Co.

The boiler makers at the Gaar Scott plant who have been on a strike for several months are still out and the chances are that they will remain out.

A NEW RIP VAN WINKLE

[Original.] One morning Walter Van Winkle, a lineal descendant of the great Rip, awoke in the Catskills. The only difference between the first and the last Van Winkle was that the first slept twenty years, the last forty. Walter had gone to the mountains one summer with a party of young New York bank clerks, had got separated from the others and had taken a four decade nap.

Descending the mountain, he footed it to Catskill and was surprised to come upon a railway station. A train was pulling out, and he jumped aboard. The conductor on collecting his fare punched a printed slip and handed it to him.

"What's this?" asked Van Winkle.

"Excess fare."

"What'll I do with it?"

The conductor passed on without reply, and a passenger explained that the slip was a check on the conductor to guard against his stealing the fare collected. Van Winkle looked at his informant aghast.

"And the management makes slips of its conductors? And they submit to such a system?"

"Conductors and passengers are both the company's slaves now."

Van Winkle gave a low whistle.

"Is this want of trust to individual honor confined to railroads?"

"By no means. No one is trusted except the managers, and they are trying to beat one another."

"Is there no standard of honor?"

"No. Once a merchant who failed felt disgraced; now merchants fail in order to make money."

When Van Winkle reached New York he went to the banking house where he had been employed. It was now on the ground floor of a thirty story skyscraper. Of course he knew no one there, or, rather, no one knew him. He wrote a note to the president, Richard Trimble, who had been a clerk with him forty years before and on the camping trip at which he had disappeared. Van Winkle was shown into the president's private office and received with suspicion. Not daring to give the Rip Van Winkle story, he said he had gone to see the world. He asked for a position, and there being a vacancy in a department where large sums were handled he was appointed. The salary was $800 a year.

"Eight hundred a year for guarding millions!" exclaimed Van Winkle.

"All that's changed, Walter. We don't need to rely on our employees' honesty now; we insure it."

"Insure it?"

"Yes. A company for a premium takes the risk."

"And do you mean, friend of my boy, to insure me?"

"As president of the bank I can't help doing so. It's a rule made by the directors."

"Then if I come in here to work for you I am at liberty to beat the bank if I can?"

"Certainly."

"Do you refrain from beating it because of your integrity?"

"I'd be a fool to beat it—illegally."

"I see."

"Sorry I can't do any better for you, Walter. You should have stuck to business as I have instead of roaming all over the world."

"Let me ask you one question, Dick."

"Go ahead."

"Are you an honest man?"

Trimble put his lips to Van Winkle's ear and whispered: "Only in small things, not in big ones; no petty concern for me. This is between me and a friend of my boyhood."

"It's taken you years to learn to be dishonest. I've learned it in one day. I see it's become the fashion."

"You might as well wear a plug hat made of beaver as to be honest—that is, what we used to call honest."

"I see. When shall I go to work?"

"Tomorrow, if you like."

When Van Winkle appeared at the bank the next day he found a photograph there. President Trimble came out of his private office and said:

"You'll have to be photographed, Walter."

"What for?"

"Oh, the rule is to have a photograph of all our employees. They're easier caught if they light out with the funds of the bank."

"A sort of rogues' gallery?"

"It's for those who become rogues. Most concerns get their clerks together occasionally and photograph them in groups. Makes the boys feel their importance, and the concern has the gallery. But we don't stoop to that. We take a picture of every employee before he begins work."

"Is there any more of this sort of thing to learn?"

"Yes; one. You'll have two weeks' vacation during the year—two vacations of one week each at six months' interval."

"I don't want any vacation. I lost forty years by my last vacation."

"But you must take your vacation."

"Why so?"

"That we may have an opportunity to examine your accounts."

"Poor dog Trust's dead indeed!" remarked Van Winkle, with a sickly smile.

"Better dead than dying. Give me a community of honor or one of acknowledged rogues."

"Is there any community in America where our former standard still exists?"

"Not in commercial life."

"How about the army?"

"There's a good deal left there, I believe."

"Very well; I'll go there. I'm too old to enlist, but I can become a mule driver, and that's better than making money under the rogue system."

And he did. OSCAR COX.
