

THE SOCIAL WHIRL

Edited by Miss Elizabeth R. Thomas

FWLER-HASECOSTER.

A pretty morning wedding marked by its simplicity was celebrated this morning in the Trinity Lutheran church at ten-thirty o'clock when Miss Pearl Hasecoster, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Hasecoster became the bride of Mr. Walter William Fowler of Fremont, Nebraska. Rev. Joseph Beck performed the ceremony in the presence of a large number of wedding guests who had been invited to witness the service.

The church was beautifully and artistically decorated with palms and ferns. Fall flowers and yellow chrysanthemums were used about the chancel which was also embellished with ferns. Five young women, intimate friends of the bride were the ushers. They were Miss Coral Weegman, Miss Deborah Sedgwick, Miss Margaret Sedgwick, Miss Florence McGuire and Miss Frances Kelson, of Vincennes, Ind. The bride, who entered the church on the arm of her father, Mr. John Hasecoster, wore a hand-made suit of green English broadcloth and an elaborate black picture hat. They were preceded to the altar by the ushers. She wore a pretty bouquet of violets. Miss Laura Gaston, one of the best known musicians in this city presided at the organ and played a beautiful program of bridal airs before the ceremony. During the service and while the ritual was being said she played Lohengrin's wedding march.

The ushers wore pretty dresses of green broadcloth. Their hats were large picture ones trimmed in plumes. They carried yellow chrysanthemums. After the ceremony Mr. and Mrs. Fowler left for Fremont, Nebraska, where they will make their future home. They have the best wishes for a happy future, of their hosts of friends in this city. The bride is a most popular young woman and has a large circle of friends who are sorry to see her leave. She is also well known in the musical circles here. For some time she has been a member of the choir of the St. Paul's Episcopal church. She studied music at Earlham college and has assisted with a number of musical events given at this institution. A number of charming and very pretty ante-nuptial events have been given for her by her many friends during the past few weeks, including showers, luncheons and dinner parties.

Mr. Fowler is equally well known in business and social circles of his home town, where he is a mining engineer. Several guests from St. Louis, Chicago and other points came to attend the wedding.

This was one of the most important weddings of the fall social schedule partly on account of the prominence of the bride and her family.

ARE POPULAR.
The latest French fashion is in striped goods, fine stripes of white on pink or blue on green or black on white. The stripes themselves are used as trimming on morning and tailored dresses by using the fabrics with the stripes running up an down for the body of the frock and horizontally for the bodice trimming bands and the wide skirtband.

A little touch of black is usually introduced at the neck and sleeves in the form of satin piping. Sometimes there is a little fall cravat of tinted lace or of black velvet.

Another combination is the striped fabric with the plain in the same shade, the stripes being used either as the body of the dress or as its trimming. This trimming usually takes the form of yoke, oversleeves and wide skirtband.

A GUEST HERE.
Miss Grace Mills, of Cambridge City, is in the city to attend the fall festival. She is the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Albert Albertson.

IS VISITING HERE.
Mr. Homer McCoy, of Parkersburg, W. Va., is in the city for a visit with friends and relatives.

VISITING THE RENKS.
Mrs. Edith McClure, of Greenville, Ohio, is here for a visit with Mr. and Mrs. George Renk of South Twelfth street.

ARE AT HOME.
George C. Browne has returned from a ten weeks trip in the western states and Pacific coast in the interest of the Woman's Home Companion.

Mrs. George C. Browne has returned from an extended visit with relatives in Oklahoma and Kansas.

ENTERTAINED FRIENDS.
Last evening Dr. and Mrs. W. J. Smith entertained a few friends, informally at their new home in North Twenty-first street. The time was pleasantly spent in social conversation and an elegant luncheon was served. A prominent feature of the evening was the announcement of the engagement of Miss Anna Mary Johnson, daughter of Alfred Johnson, North Eighteenth street to Dr. Charles J. Overman of Marion, Ind. The announcement was made in an unique manner by distributing tiny traveling suit cases, filled with candy hearts as baggage and enclosing a card inscribed with the names of the happy couple. The wedding is to take place in the early winter.

PARTY FOR MISS HUBER.
Perhaps one of the most beautiful parties given this fall for bride-elects was the one of last evening arranged for by Miss Hettie Elliott and Miss Caroline Heltbrink. The pretty event was in honor of Miss Naomi Huber, who will be married Wednesday, October twelfth to Mr. Paul Benefield.

The affair was held at the home of Miss Heltbrink, 518 South Thirteenth street. Autumn flowers with greenery made the house most attractive. The main feature of the evening was the musical program presented by Miss Elizabeth Hasecoster, Miss Hilda Shute and Miss Anna Heltbrink, although games and social conversation were indulged in. The hostesses were assisted in entertaining by Miss Rhea Ackerman and Miss Florence Johnson. The girls wore pretty summer gowns. The party was in the nature of a plant shower and the bride-elect, during the evening, was presented with a number of beautiful plants by the guests. Each guest had written a verse which was fastened to the flower and later read aloud so all might enjoy them. Many clever and unique rhymes as well as witty jingles were included in the number.

Later in the evening the guests were bidden to the dining room where an elaborate luncheon was served. This apartment was especially attractive with its embellishments of flowers and ferns. Strands of smilax intermingled with pink snapdragons were brought from the chandelier and fastened at the four corners of the table. A large wedding cake formed a center piece for the table. Candles with pink shades were used to light the table. Vases of pink roses and snapdragons were also placed on the sideboard and mantle piece. The guests were Miss Reece, Miss Edith Moore, Miss Hilda Shute, Miss Elizabeth Hasecoster, Miss Martha Boyd, Miss Anna Klenker, Misses Anna and Magdalena Schultz, Miss Kithur Parsons, Miss Anna Finck, Mrs. George Bartel, Mrs. John Marshall, Miss Hilda Miller, Miss Alice Kamp, Miss Alice Hawekotte and Miss Freda Benefield.

FOR BRIDAL PARTY.
In honor of the Fowler-Hasecoster wedding party a dinner was given last evening by Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Gennett at their home in South Eighth street. The table was unusually pretty being appointed with bride's roses and ferns. Places were arranged at the table for Mr. and Mrs. John Hasecoster, Mr. George Fowler, of St. Louis, Miss Pearl Hasecoster, Mr. Walter W. Fowler, of Fremont, Neb., Miss Florence McGuire, Misses Deborah and Margaret Sedgwick, Miss Coral Weegman, Miss Frances Kelson of Vincennes, Indiana and Miss Hasecoster of Cleveland, O.

PARTY FOR GUESTS.
Tuesday afternoon Mrs. Thomas M. Kaufman gave the first of a series of parties to be given by her this fall. The guests of honor were Miss Mattie Belle Sayle, of New Liberty, Kentucky and Mrs. John Aufderheide, of Indianapolis. Bridge was played at three tables. Mrs. Herbert Lehr of Evansville, Indiana and Mrs. S. E. Swayne were given the favors. The rooms where the game was played were embellished with white chrysanthemums. The luncheon was served in the dining room. Richmond roses were used in appointing the table. Candles capped with red shades also added to the beauty of the table appointment. The guests invited were Miss Rose Gennett, Miss Marie Campbell, Miss Caroline Hollingsworth, Miss Juliet Swayne, Mrs. S. E. Swayne, Mrs. Herbert Lehr, of Evansville, Mrs. Wilbur Hibberd, Mrs. A. D. Gayle, Miss Mary Gaar and Mrs. Howard Jones.

A GUEST HERE.
Miss Ethel Bunnell, of Urbana, O., is in the city to attend the fall festival and visit her aunt, Mrs. Charles Arrowmuth, for a few days. Mrs. Bunnell will arrive in the city today.

RETURNED HOME.
Miss Mattie Belle Gayle returned to her home in New Liberty, Ky., after a visit in this city with Mrs. A. D. Gayle of South Sixteenth street. Several social events were given in her honor.

TO ATTEND WEDDING.
Several guests from out of town were in the city today to attend the Fowler-Hasecoster wedding which was celebrated this morning at the Trinity Lutheran church.

FEW SOCIAL EVENTS.
Only a few social events are scheduled for this week. The regular weekly party at the Country club will not be given this week on account of the festival.

HOGGART-NELSON.
Miss Ethel Nelson and Mr. Harrison Hoggart were quietly married Saturday, October first at the Second Presbyterian church parsonage, by the Rev. Thomas McNary. Both young people are well known here. They smoothed her pillow. Then, rising to her feet, she gave a little toast and began, for the third time in his history to arrive the faded beauty of her every-day life.

"You owe me nothing at all. Do you think I receive nothing in return for my poor provision for you? What would my life be if it were bereft of your companionship, your ready sympathy, your enduring love?"

"No," she replied. "From what I could gather from the manager who engaged me, the firm is slightly changing their policy. But of late circumstances have gone against them, and they had felt the pinch of real and actual hunger. The bankruptcy of the firm for whom I had hitherto worked had proved the crisis in their sad fortune. Day by day and week by week the brave-hearted girl had sought diligently, but in vain, for another post. Tired and dejected, she had returned each day with no good news to tell her anxious sister. But with the morning hope had revived, and she had once more set out on her fruitless quest. And to-day she had succeeded."

"Camela," said Jessie from her couch. "You have good news for me! I can see it in your face! Tell me, quick! Oh, are our dreadful anxieties really at an end at last?"

"Yes," she replied, "they have been turned and knelt down on the threshold carpet by her sister's side. There were tears in her eyes when she attempted to conceal her joy. But of late circumstances had gained a post at last. The firm for whom she had hitherto worked, street, city, have engaged me as typist and shorthand clerk. I am to have twenty-five shillings a week. Jessie put both arms around her sister's neck and burst into a flood of tears.

"Oh, I am so glad!" she sobbed hysterically. "I have been so hard on you while there was no hope. But now success has come I can't keep the tears back any more. My poor dear, patient, self-sacrificing sister, Oh, how good you are to me! But for me, your own troubles would be light. Oh, how much I owe to you!"

Camela laid one hand upon her sister's face.

"I suppose," he went on thoughtfully, "that the relations between employer and employee are different over there from what they are here. I've heard of it. Here, if a man does his work well he not only gets his wage, but he is treated with respect and consideration. We have a chat with him on occasions about his family or his opinions. He is a man like unto ourselves, and the gulf between us is an exceedingly narrow one."

"But over there things are vastly different. Not a man is interchanged with another upon strictly business matters. Any deviation from this rule is regarded by the employer as presumption. It used to be different, of course, in the good old days—the days of which Dickens wrote. But now it is altered. Capital and labor are at war, and many of the poor devils who do the work are disgracefully underpaid. I wonder what sort of a man Uncle Joshua was in this respect; and I wonder what sort of a master the employer expect to find in me?"

He swept the broad expanse before him with his keen grey eyes. It was a lovely picture. Smiling pastures dotted everywhere with numberless sheep, a dark sweep of leafy fens stretched far away, a few gnarled willows overhanging the homestead creek, the rich clusters of fruit in the adjacent orchard, and, lastly, the homestead itself, with its white roof and green front of weatherboard over which a perfect mass of roses, yellow and white and red, climbed wantonly, filling the air with a rich perfume.

Once more he read the letter that still lay in his hand. It ran as follows: "Pembroke Street, Lincoln's Inn, London, W. C., Sept. 15, 1890.

"Dear Sir—We have to announce to you the death of your late uncle, Joshua Mayhew, merchant, of this city. By his will you are appointed sole heir to all his property, with the one proviso and condition that you continue to carry on the business which he himself established. This will probably necessitate your permanent residence in London. As soon as you arrive we shall be happy to meet you and arrange the necessary formalities. We may say that your uncle's business is in a thoroughly prosperous condition. We are, dear sir, yours faithfully,

"Gilbert C. Orme, Solicitors."

Coming to the end, he folded the letter and put it in his pocket.

He smiled to himself, and then, turning, stepped from the veranda into the house. There he sat down by the window and resumed his meditations. But an hour later he was examining the advertisement of outward-bound steamers, and making preparations for his coming departure.

Camela Crawford entered a mean little room honored by the name of sitting-room, and divested herself of hat and coat. An eager face watched her from the chimney corner. The old lady, who had been making the tea, was sitting there, looking up at her with a questioning expression. Presently she grew calmer and looking up, questioned Camela concerning her new condition.

"Did you see Mr. Mayhew himself?" asked Jessie.

Camela shook her head.

"No," she replied. "From what I could gather from the manager who engaged me, the firm is slightly changing their policy. But of late circumstances have gone against them, and they had felt the pinch of real and actual hunger. The bankruptcy of the firm for whom I had hitherto worked had proved the crisis in their sad fortune. Day by day and week by week the brave-hearted girl had sought diligently, but in vain, for another post. Tired and dejected, she had returned each day with no good news to tell her anxious sister. But with the morning hope had revived, and she had once more set out on her fruitless quest. And to-day she had succeeded."

"Camela," said Jessie from her couch. "You have good news for me! I can see it in your face! Tell me, quick! Oh, are our dreadful anxieties really at an end at last?"

"Yes," she replied, "they have been turned and knelt down on the threshold carpet by her sister's side. There were tears in her eyes when she attempted to conceal her joy. But of late circumstances had gained a post at last. The firm for whom she had hitherto worked, street, city, have engaged me as typist and shorthand clerk. I am to have twenty-five shillings a week. Jessie put both arms around her sister's neck and burst into a flood of tears.

"I suppose," he went on thoughtfully, "that the relations between employer and employee are different over there from what they are here. I've heard of it. Here, if a man does his work well he not only gets his wage, but he is treated with respect and consideration. We have a chat with him on occasions about his family or his opinions. He is a man like unto ourselves, and the gulf between us is an exceedingly narrow one."

"But over there things are vastly different. Not a man is interchanged with another upon strictly business matters. Any deviation from this rule is regarded by the employer as presumption. It used to be different, of course, in the good old days—the days of which Dickens wrote. But now it is altered. Capital and labor are at war, and many of the poor devils who do the work are disgracefully underpaid. I wonder what sort of a man Uncle Joshua was in this respect; and I wonder what sort of a master the employer expect to find in me?"

He swept the broad expanse before him with his keen grey eyes. It was a lovely picture. Smiling pastures dotted everywhere with numberless sheep, a dark sweep of leafy fens stretched far away, a few gnarled willows overhanging the homestead creek, the rich clusters of fruit in the adjacent orchard, and, lastly, the homestead itself, with its white roof and green front of weatherboard over which a perfect mass of roses, yellow and white and red, climbed wantonly, filling the air with a rich perfume.

Once more he read the letter that still lay in his hand. It ran as follows: "Pembroke Street, Lincoln's Inn, London, W. C., Sept. 15, 1890.

"Dear Sir—We have to announce to you the death of your late uncle, Joshua Mayhew, merchant, of this city. By his will you are appointed sole heir to all his property, with the one proviso and condition that you continue to carry on the business which he himself established. This will probably necessitate your permanent residence in London. As soon as you arrive we shall be happy to meet you and arrange the necessary formalities. We may say that your uncle's business is in a thoroughly prosperous condition. We are, dear sir, yours faithfully,

"Gilbert C. Orme, Solicitors."

Coming to the end, he folded the letter and put it in his pocket.

He smiled to himself, and then, turning, stepped from the veranda into the house. There he sat down by the window and resumed his meditations. But an hour later he was examining the advertisement of outward-bound steamers, and making preparations for his coming departure.

Camela Crawford entered a mean little room honored by the name of sitting-room, and divested herself of hat and coat. An eager face watched her from the chimney corner. The old lady, who had been making the tea, was sitting there, looking up at her with a questioning expression. Presently she grew calmer and looking up, questioned Camela concerning her new condition.

"Did you see Mr. Mayhew himself?" asked Jessie.

Camela shook her head.

"No," she replied. "From what I could gather from the manager who engaged me, the firm is slightly changing their policy. But of late circumstances have gone against them, and they had felt the pinch of real and actual hunger. The bankruptcy of the firm for whom I had hitherto worked had proved the crisis in their sad fortune. Day by day and week by week the brave-hearted girl had sought diligently, but in vain, for another post. Tired and dejected, she had returned each day with no good news to tell her anxious sister. But with the morning hope had revived, and she had once more set out on her fruitless quest. And to-day she had succeeded."

"Camela," said Jessie from her couch. "You have good news for me! I can see it in your face! Tell me, quick! Oh, are our dreadful anxieties really at an end at last?"

"Yes," she replied, "they have been turned and knelt down on the threshold carpet by her sister's side. There were tears in her eyes when she attempted to conceal her joy. But of late circumstances had gained a post at last. The firm for whom she had hitherto worked, street, city, have engaged me as typist and shorthand clerk. I am to have twenty-five shillings a week. Jessie put both arms around her sister's neck and burst into a flood of tears.

"I suppose," he went on thoughtfully, "that the relations between employer and employee are different over there from what they are here. I've heard of it. Here, if a man does his work well he not only gets his wage, but he is treated with respect and consideration. We have a chat with him on occasions about his family or his opinions. He is a man like unto ourselves, and the gulf between us is an exceedingly narrow one."

"But over there things are vastly different. Not a man is interchanged with another upon strictly business matters. Any deviation from this rule is regarded by the employer as presumption. It used to be different, of course, in the good old days—the days of which Dickens wrote. But now it is altered. Capital and labor are at war, and many of the poor devils who do the work are disgracefully underpaid. I wonder what sort of a man Uncle Joshua was in this respect; and I wonder what sort of a master the employer expect to find in me?"

He swept the broad expanse before him with his keen grey eyes. It was a lovely picture. Smiling pastures dotted everywhere with numberless sheep, a dark sweep of leafy fens stretched far away, a few gnarled willows overhanging the homestead creek, the rich clusters of fruit in the adjacent orchard, and, lastly, the homestead itself, with its white roof and green front of weatherboard over which a perfect mass of roses, yellow and white and red, climbed wantonly, filling the air with a rich perfume.

Once more he read the letter that still lay in his hand. It ran as follows: "Pembroke Street, Lincoln's Inn, London, W. C., Sept. 15, 1890.

"Dear Sir—We have to announce to you the death of your late uncle, Joshua Mayhew, merchant, of this city. By his will you are appointed sole heir to all his property, with the one proviso and condition that you continue to carry on the business which he himself established. This will probably necessitate your permanent residence in London. As soon as you arrive we shall be happy to meet you and arrange the necessary formalities. We may say that your uncle's business is in a thoroughly prosperous condition. We are, dear sir, yours faithfully,

"Gilbert C. Orme, Solicitors."

Coming to the end, he folded the letter and put it in his pocket.

He smiled to himself, and then, turning, stepped from the veranda into the house. There he sat down by the window and resumed his meditations. But an hour later he was examining the advertisement of outward-bound steamers, and making preparations for his coming departure.

Camela Crawford entered a mean little room honored by the name of sitting-room, and divested herself of hat and coat. An eager face watched her from the chimney corner. The old lady, who had been making the tea, was sitting there, looking up at her with a questioning expression. Presently she grew calmer and looking up, questioned Camela concerning her new condition.

"Did you see Mr. Mayhew himself?" asked Jessie.

Camela shook her head.

"No," she replied. "From what I could gather from the manager who engaged me, the firm is slightly changing their policy. But of late circumstances have gone against them, and they had felt the pinch of real and actual hunger. The bankruptcy of the firm for whom I had hitherto worked had proved the crisis in their sad fortune. Day by day and week by week the brave-hearted girl had sought diligently, but in vain, for another post. Tired and dejected, she had returned each day with no good news to tell her anxious sister. But with the morning hope had revived, and she had once more set out on her fruitless quest. And to-day she had succeeded."

"Camela," said Jessie from her couch. "You have good news for me! I can see it in your face! Tell me, quick! Oh, are our dreadful anxieties really at an end at last?"

"Yes," she replied, "they have been turned and knelt down on the threshold carpet by her sister's side. There were tears in her eyes when she attempted to conceal her joy. But of late circumstances had gained a post at last. The firm for whom she had hitherto worked, street, city, have engaged me as typist and shorthand clerk. I am to have twenty-five shillings a week. Jessie put both arms around her sister's neck and burst into a flood of tears.

"I suppose," he went on thoughtfully, "that the relations between employer and employee are different over there from what they are here. I've heard of it. Here, if a man does his work well he not only gets his wage, but he is treated with respect and consideration. We have a chat with him on occasions about his family or his opinions. He is a man like unto ourselves, and the gulf between us is an exceedingly narrow one."

"But over there things are vastly different. Not a man is interchanged with another upon strictly business matters. Any deviation from this rule is regarded by the employer as presumption. It used to be different, of course, in the good old days—the days of which Dickens wrote. But now it is altered. Capital and labor are at war, and many of the poor devils who do the work are disgracefully underpaid. I wonder what sort of a man Uncle Joshua was in this respect; and I wonder what sort of a master the employer expect to find in me?"

He swept the broad expanse before him with his keen grey eyes. It was a lovely picture. Smiling pastures dotted everywhere with numberless sheep, a dark sweep of leafy fens stretched far away, a few gnarled willows overhanging the homestead creek, the rich clusters of fruit in the adjacent orchard, and, lastly, the homestead itself, with its white roof and green front of weatherboard over which a perfect mass of roses, yellow and white and red, climbed wantonly, filling the air with a rich perfume.

Once more he read the letter that still lay in his hand. It ran as follows: "Pembroke Street, Lincoln's Inn, London, W. C., Sept. 15, 1890.

"Dear Sir—We have to announce to you the death of your late uncle, Joshua Mayhew, merchant, of this city. By his will you are appointed sole heir to all his property, with the one proviso and condition that you continue to carry on the business which he himself established. This will probably necessitate your permanent residence in London. As soon as you arrive we shall be happy to meet you and arrange the necessary formalities. We may say that your uncle's business is in a thoroughly prosperous condition. We are, dear sir, yours faithfully,

"Gilbert C. Orme, Solicitors."

Coming to the end, he folded the letter and put it in his pocket.

He smiled to himself, and then, turning, stepped from the veranda into the house. There he sat down by the window and resumed his meditations. But an hour later he was examining the advertisement of outward-bound steamers, and making preparations for his coming departure.

Camela Crawford entered a mean little room honored by the name of sitting-room, and divested herself of hat and coat. An eager face watched her from the chimney corner. The old lady, who had been making the tea, was sitting there, looking up at her with a questioning expression. Presently she grew calmer and looking up, questioned Camela concerning her new condition.

"Did you see Mr. Mayhew himself?" asked Jessie.

Camela shook her head.

"No," she replied. "From what I could gather from the manager who engaged me, the firm is slightly changing their policy. But of late circumstances have gone against them, and they had felt the pinch of real and actual hunger. The bankruptcy of the firm for whom I had hitherto worked had proved the crisis in their sad fortune. Day by day and week by week the brave-hearted girl had sought diligently, but in vain, for another post. Tired and dejected, she had returned each day with no good news to tell her anxious sister. But with the morning hope had revived, and she had once more set out on her fruitless quest. And to-day she had succeeded."

"Camela," said Jessie from her couch. "You have good news for me! I can see it in your face! Tell me, quick! Oh, are our dreadful anxieties really at an end at last?"

"Yes," she replied, "they have been turned and knelt down on the threshold carpet by her sister's side. There were tears in her eyes when she attempted to conceal her joy. But of late circumstances had gained a post at last. The firm for whom she had hitherto worked, street, city, have engaged me as typist and shorthand clerk. I am to have twenty-five shillings a week. Jessie put both arms around her sister's neck and burst into a flood of tears.

GREAT CROWDS TO GREET ROOSEVELT

His Reception in This City Next Week Promises to Be a Big Affair.

WILL SPEAK AT COLISEUM

ARRANGEMENTS HAVE BEEN MADE FOR EX-GOVERNOR TAYLOR OF KENTUCKY TO ALSO SPEAK AT THIS MEETING.

The Republican County Central Committee will make arrangements for former governor William L. Taylor, of Kentucky, to address the Republicans at the Roosevelt meeting, next Thursday evening. Mr. Taylor will make an address previous to that of Col. Roosevelt.

Ex-Governor Taylor has a wide reputation as an orator and has appeared on Chautauqua platforms in Richmond. As a political speaker he is also well known. Secretary Pelts and Col. Wiley, county chairman, are making arrangements for the Roosevelt meeting, and are sure that the Coliseum will be filled as it was never filled before.

Probably the Richmond City and Greensboro Republican bands will meet Col. Roosevelt, when he arrives here about 8:30 next Thursday evening on a special over the C. & O. from Muncie, Ind. It is believed by Col. Wiley that five thousand people will be at the C. & O. station to greet the former president. There will be no delay there as the intention is to rush him to the Coliseum with all possible haste so that the speech may be as long as possible.

The James Garfield date has been arranged for Tuesday evening, the eighteenth, and this address will also be at the Coliseum. A big crowd will probably hear Mr. Garfield. Never has there been such a list of speeches arranged for a Republican campaign in Richmond or Wayne county.

REAL ESTATE TRANSFERS

Myrtle Lister to Elmer Kendall at lot 1, S. W. Q. R. Sec. 5, Twp. 14, range 1, $1,500.00. New Garden Twp.

Samuel McCain to Virginia E. Harris, lot 63, Benton Heights Add. to city, $250.

Eugene McCain to Horace P. Harlan at lot 63 Hayes Add. to city, $2,750.

High Allen, Comr. to Albert W. Weldon at S. E. Q. R. Sec. 31, Twp. 18, range 15, $4,500. Perry Twp.

Jacob Williams to Wm. W. Benson, Pt. N. E. and N. W. Q. R. Sec. 11, Twp. 17, range 14, $6,300.00, New Garden Twp.

Geo. Frazen, Gdn. to Wm. W. Benson, Pt. S. W. Q. R. Sec. 11, Twp. 17, range 14, $1,675.75. New Garden Twp.

Jacob Williams et al. to Wm. W. Benson, Pt. S. W. Q. R. Sec. 11, Twp. 17, range 14, New Garden Twp., $2,700.

August Uhde to City of Richmond, lot 38, Oliver Kinsey's Add. to City, $350.00.

Anthony Greisinger et al. to Wm. Greisinger et al. lot 1, blk 1, Cambridge City, $750.

Cora E. Higher to Samuel McCain, lot 38, Oliver Kinsey's Add. to City, $350.00.

"She is my sister," she said simply, and returned to her seat and by her side.

He watched her as her fingers moved lightly over the keys. What was it that stirred within him? Was it admiration for her evident qualities, her life of devotion and self-sacrifice? Perhaps a little. But was there nothing else? He dropped his glance to the table, and sat quite still. Ten minutes later he again cast a swift glance at that delicately moulded face. Nor was the unconscious still looking at her. She was looking at him. He was looking at her. He was looking at her. He was looking at her.

"Mr. Rodney has not yet arrived," explained Camela one fine Monday morning as the manager took his seat by the table.

"Oh, didn't he mention it? The fact is, Miss Crawford, he gave me a week's notice, and I shall be up on Saturday."

"He didn't hold his breath," she said. "He's a good worker, and I was sorry to lose him. But he was a little quizzical. A handsome fellow, and a good deal of a man. He was smiling, and he was looking up at me in surprise. I asked them about it."

"Well, Mr. Rodney," he said, "I thought you'd guess."

"I'm afraid," she said, "you are a little quizzical. A handsome fellow, and a good deal of a man. He was smiling, and he was looking up at me in surprise. I asked them about it."

"Well, Mr. Rodney," he said, "I thought you'd guess."

"I'm afraid," she said, "you are a little quizzical. A handsome fellow, and a good deal of a man. He was smiling, and he was looking up at me in surprise. I asked them about it."

"Well, Mr. Rodney," he said, "I thought you'd guess."

"I'm afraid," she said, "you are a little quizzical. A handsome fellow, and a good deal of a man. He was smiling, and he was looking up at me in surprise. I asked them about it."

A Tonic-Stimulant.

The active business man, the brain worker, and all this class of people could not stand the constant strain on their brain and nerves were it not for the timely use of a pure, gentle, invigorating tonic.

Duffy's Pure Malt Whiskey