

THREATS TO SHOOT HALT A FUGITIVE

Alleged Negro Horse Thief,
However, Tried to Knife
His Captor.

"Stop or I'll shoot," yelled Patrolman Voglesong this morning as he pointed his revolver at Walter Crane, a twenty-one-year-old negro, accused of having stolen a horse and buggy at Middletown yesterday. Voglesong had been sent to the home of Mrs. Arnold on the Twelfth street pike, where it was said Crane had stayed last night. As Voglesong and Patrolman Fee entered the barn yard at the Arnold place, Crane started to run. The negro refused to stop and as the patrolmen knew that if Crane was able to reach the underbrush along the river, a short distance away, that he would not be caught, he pulled his revolver from its holster and yelled again to the fleeing negro.

Crane stopped this time, but when Voglesong caught up with him and grabbed him, Crane jerked a large pocket knife from his trousers and attempted to cut the policeman. He put up a struggle, but was soon overpowered and is now in the city jail awaiting a preliminary hearing on the charge of horse stealing.

Crane is a local negro and has been employed by contractors as a hod carrier. He is alleged to have stolen the outfit at Third and Main streets at Middletown, yesterday. He came to this city yesterday and is said to have attempted to sell it to Philip Schneider.
