

TEACHERS EXAMINE PUPILS' HOME LIFE TO IMPROVE WORK

Garfield Instructors Employ System of Individual Supervision by Studying Each Student's Environment.

The advisory system of the supervision of pupils by the teachers, has been perfected for the school year, by the teaching staff of the Garfield school. The system is not new to the school, having been used for the last three years, but this year the system is more complete in its details, and embraces every department.

Each of the sixteen teachers has direct supervision of a group of pupils, numbering from twenty to fifty. Under the system the teacher is responsible for the attendance of the pupils in her group. In case of absence the teacher is required to investigate the cause, and determine whether or not the excuse offered is valid.

Every teacher is expected to make a study of the habits and characteristics of each pupil in her group. In so far as possible the home life of the pupils is also examined. The teacher may visit the home, and confer with the parents, gaining in this way a knowledge of the pupil's advantages, home surroundings, and the discipline to which the child has been subjected. The teacher has a chance to learn of the various causes that govern the child's conduct in the school room, and be better prepared to meet the requirements of the individuality of each pupil.

The teacher is further expected to keep careful watch over the progress of the pupils in their studies. Under this system the old mistaken idea that all children are alike, and can be handled in the same way, is obsolete. Different methods are applied to the varying requirements of individual pupils, and when one pupil falls behind other members of the class in scholarship, every effort is made to find the exact cause, and immediately take steps to remedy it.

Professor N. C. Heironimus, principal, and his assistant Miss Clara B. Graves, have supervision over the entire system. Professor Heironimus has charge of the boys' group and Miss Graves the girls'.
