THE SANDMAN STORY FOR TO-NIGHT

THE GREEN WARRIOR

Once upon a time there lived a tribe of Indians on the Western plains near a great rock that stood by a swift running river. These people had been driven out of their homes in the north and were weary wandering to find a place to pitch their tents. So when they came one evening upon the beautiful broad river flowing through the plain and saw the great rock with its broad top, the wise man of the tribe declared at once that this must be their future home.

They made houses on the summit of the huge, flat stone, they planted tobacco in the rich land and from the river they caught fish, while the prairie furnished them with plenty of game. They were happy and none happier than little Wild Flower, the daughter of the chief.

Now in love with this girl was a young Indian of the same tribe, but the old chief did not wish his daughter to marry the young man. The reason was that this young Indian was a cripple in both feet and could do nothing but sit before his tent and make arrows all day. But Wild Flower loved him, yet feared to anger her powerful father by showing it. The cripple's name was Red Deer and people thought that he talked to the Great Spirit, for often he would spend days in singing strange hymns and fashioning an arrow of black wood with a white stone tip.

One day a messenger rushed into the tent of the chief and announced that the enemy who had driven them out of the old homes was coming.

"They are coming over the distant hills like clouds of locusts," said the messenger, "and the Green Warrior is leading them."

"We will not wait for them here," said the chief as he rushed from his tent and gave a loud war cry. "I will take my braves and meet them before they have a chance to harm our homes." So it was arranged that all the men, except Red Deer, should go with the chief and fight the enemy at some distance from their rock. So the warriors left with shouts and clashing of their war shields, while Red Deer alone of the men remained at home.

For hours he sat rubbing the black arrow till it shone like a gem. Wild Flower came to his side.

"What is that odd arrow you have finished?" she asked, and the young man replied that it was a magic one which he had been taught by his grandmother to fashion; that it had just been completed today, and that anyone hurt with it would become a plant which they had resembled in life.

"If I can only get a chance at the Green Warrior," said Red Deer. "I would end his life with this and see if he would not be of some use in death—he does enough harm in life."

Glancing toward the east Red Deer caught sight of a great host of red warriors on horses galloping toward the rock.

"Your father has missed the enemy, shouted he. "But I will meet them." "I can see my father returning, but he is far off yet," exclaimed Wild Flower. "And the Green Warrior will destroy us before we can get aid. I see his green robes waving in the wind and the yellow plume on his war bonnet dancing as his horse leaps this way."

Without a word Red Deer, grasping his bow and the black arrow, had managed to scramble down the sides of the rock. At the foot he hid behind a thick bush. Across the river swam the foe with the Green Warrior at their head, but just as this leader began to climb the bank Red Deer sent the black arrow swiftly into his heart. The Green Warrior's son rushed out of the water and pulled Red Deer to the bank, throwing him into the stream. The body of the Green Warrior floated by Red Deer and lodged in the foot of the cliff, while Red Deer himself struck out wildly for the shore. Strange to say, he felt his muscles grow strong and his feet pushed out straight into a swimming stroke—and sudden plunge and the exertion had cured his lameness.

As he touched the bank he heard the cries of the chief's braves rushing to meet the enemy. And in ten minutes every trace of the Green Warrior's men had disappeared in a cloud of dust lost in the distance. Wild Flower and Red Deer went to the chief to ask that they might marry, and as the father gave his consent he pointed to a strange new plant that stood at the foot of the cliff.

"That is the work of my black arrow!" exclaimed Red Deer. "The Green Warrior has been turned into a useful plant. See the green stalk and the yellow silken tassel hanging out of the ear of corn? My grandfather told me that some day my arrow would bring us great good fortune, so this new plant must be our special care and we will call it Indian corn."

So from the body of the Green Warrior sprang the corn now known over all America.

A Philadelphia firm advertised for a bookkeeper "not taller than five feet five inches." This was a necessary qualification because the bookkeeping department was in a mezzanine gallery.
