On The Screen

WASHINGTON

Mary Pickford's picture, "The Little Princess," from the story by Frances Hodgson Burnett, which will be seen at the Washington today and Thursday is a reminder that Christmas is coming and that the well known shopping for the children must soon commence. Christmas trees, roast turkeys, presents, dolls and candy figure prominently in the incidents of the picture. When the Christmas tree is decorated in Miss Minchin's London boarding school, Mary Pickford as Sara Crewe is enacting the humble role of maid-of-all-work at the establishment, having been relegated to that position from that of one of the well cared for pupils when her father died and left her penniless. The story turns out all right in the end, however, because Sara is rescued by her father's former partner, who arrives at Christmas time with news of millions of dollars worth of diamonds from the venture of Sara's father in India. Then Sara and Becky the slavey have a Christmas tree all their own, and things are not half as bad as they appeared to the friendless children.

MURRAY

Mary Lathrop had picked out the beautiful fur trimmed evening cloak with loving care. Since her husband had been encountering "business reverses" as he called them, there had been very few new clothes for Mary. When Lathrop came home that night and told her he was in a serious financial plight she gave up her furs without a murmur, never telling him of them. The next day she hastened to return them to the fashionable shop where they had been purchased to get credit for them.

As Mary cast a farewell glance at the beautiful thing she was giving up Lola Monroe, adventuress and mistress of Robert Lathrop, of whose existence Mary had not the slightest suspicion, brushed by the little wife and with a careless glance said, "Send that wrap up to my apartment." It was the same which Mary had given up so that her husband, who had squandered his fortune on Lola Monroe, might find his burden lighter. This is one of the many human touches which makes the Triangle picture, "Fanatics," at the Murray theatre today and Thursday a screen masterpiece. J. Brney Sherry is featured in this film drama of real life.

MURRETTE

Snakes now cause excitement almost anywhere, but particularly when they are released among the members of a moving picture company as they are acting before the camera. So there was good reason for the riot during the filming of "Mountain Dew," the Triangle drama of the Kentucky hills, starring Margery Wilson, which will be shown at the Murrette theatre today and Thursday. Various scenes of Kentucky homes are shown, and among the quaint features of the mountain habitations, appears a rain-barrel, a fat, tight-hooped rain-barrel, solid and weather-beaten. A trough feeds it with water from the roof.
