True Stories of Successful Women

By Edith Moriarty

Jacob Schneider was never so disappointed in his life as when fate decided that his only child should be a girl instead of a boy. Although he idolized his small daughter he could not help saying to her now and then: "Oh, if you could only grow up to be a fine tailor like your father and I could put Schneider & Son, Ladies' Tailors, on the door of my shop."

Little Emily would promise that she would be a tailor and that he could put Schneider & Schneider on the shop and that it would be just as nice. The two lived all alone in the small apartment above the little tailor shop. Emily's mother had died when she was a baby and when she grew old enough she kept house for her father, but until then Jacob Schneider was both mother and father to Emily and nurse and housekeeper as well as a ladies' tailor.

The little tailor shop which was located in one of the small business sections which one always finds near the outskirts of any large city did a flourishing business and so Jacob decided that he would send Emily to high school after she finished grammar school.

When Emily finished high school she wanted to go to college and she was an apprentice, but he would not hear of it. He tried to talk her into going to business college, but Emily insisted that she was going to make good her childhood promise to be a tailor.

Her father finally consented, but he advised her to go to a dressmaking school first to learn the elementary things about the trade.

Tailoring Dull Work. Emily remained at the school but a few months and then she left to work for her father. It was hard at first because Jacob Schneider believed in perfection and he expected his daughter to be more perfect than any of his other help.

But Emily did not progress very fast. She could do all of the different operations, but she could not do them particularly well. She found that she did not like the work as well as she thought she would and after a suit or coat was designed and planned and cut out she lost all interest in the rest of the work.

She hated the finishing and that was what she usually had to do. The buttons and buttonholes, the bound seams, the faced collars and cuffs all had to be done and it was such close and fine work that Emily began to wish that she had gone to business school.

Choosing the styles and buying the materials she really enjoyed and nothing pleased her more than to have her father call her into the front of the shop to help some customer choose the material, lining or style for her new suit.

Became Discouraged. Often Emily would suggest some little alteration in the cut of the skirt or the coat or she would offer a new and effective color combination and always her ideas were accepted. After three years spent in this fashion she became discouraged and she asked her father if he would mind if she tried something else.

Jacob said no he would not mind, but he would like to have her stay with him another year and if she did he would let her keep his books and do just the things that she liked best about tailoring. Emily was pleased at this and so she remained with her father another year.

During that year she designed and cut most of the small trimming parts of the suits as the collars, cuffs, belts and pockets. She decided what linings and what color trimmings should be used with the different materials and she was always present at the fittings to give a word of advice as to the length of the skirt or the fit of the neck.

The customers liked it and many of them let her decide everything for them. Emily was really making new patrons for her father, but he did not realize fully just how much she was helping him. Instead of remaining with her father for one year Emily staid with him two years and she thinks she would be with him yet if one of his assistants had not told the head designer at a large suit factory about her.

$4,000 Salary at Twenty-Five. The designer in one of the largest cloak and suit factories in the country was in need of help. It was the busy season for the designing department and he could find no experienced person to work on the smaller parts of the garments.

It happened that one of Mr. Schneider's assistants worked in the factory during the busy season and he heard the designer complaining of his lack of help.

It was then that he told of Emily and how she designed many of the collars and belts and such things for the suits which her father made. The designer was not much impressed for he did not think so young a girl who had such limited experience could do the work but he decided to send for her and see.

Emily was excited about the opportunity, but her father was inclined to be pessimistic. Even after she was given the job as assistant designer of collars he refused to take her seriously. After six months, when she had been made head designer, however, he began to be proud of her and was soon bragging about his talented Emily and taking all of the credit to himself.

It has been two years now since Emily left her father's little shop, where she failed to make a tailor, to become a designer in the suit factory. She now designs all the collars for all the garments made by the firm and in addition to that she determines the colors in which the different styles of garments shall be made up.

She enjoys the work and is far happier than she was in her father's shop. She is sent to New York to buy and to visit fashionable designers, and this year she expects to be sent to Paris—and so her joy is complete. She is earning between four and five thousand dollars a year and is but twenty-five years old.
