

Heart and Beauty Problems

By Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson

Dear Mrs. Thompson: I read in your column the letter by R. S. T. on loving. I wish to say in the beginning that I cannot agree with him. First, I do not think his experience has taught him a very good lesson. Do you suppose he would like to marry a girl who practices what he preaches or would he rather marry one whose love is true and whom he can trust? I do not think the girl he advocates would make a very staunch wife. He says he is a man of experience, but I am afraid his experience has been along one line alone and perhaps when he goes around a little more he will learn that there are two kinds of girls. Here's hoping he picks his wife from the class which he does not yet know. He says he would not go with a girl more than six times whom he could not love. I have lived through a young man's experience and I would not care to go with one six times whom I could love in that way. If I were he, I would stay around the

She Married an Average Man

BY ZOE BECKLEY

Jim and I have been to Hammonds Corners together to look over the place and see the house that is to be our future home, for a time at least. I am so glad we went. I shudder less over the idea than I did at first. It is so with all troubles, I suppose.

Troubles are like a road over a hill. At a distance they look perfectly awful; impossible to climb. When we get right up to them they aren't so bad. And by the time we have reached the top there is quite a decent view!

There is a lot in Athena's rule, "Don't allow anything to be a big trouble. It's all in how you look at it. Nothing is terrible unless you think it is."

I'm trying not to think of Hammonds Corners as a calamity, and now that I've seen it I have a faint hope that it won't be.

The place is a mere hamlet, as I supposed, but pleasanter than I pictured it, with one long, wide "street" and beautiful elms. Most of the people are employed in the bridge works that Jim is to manage, and my! how deferential they all were to my old Jimmies. Everybody, from Oakes down, seemed tickled to death that he was to boss things.

The house we are to live in is not bad. Thank heaven, it is old-fashioned, without gingerbread scroll-work all over the porch, or blue and red glass in the front door! Mr. Oakes himself, owner of the works, once lived in it so there is a bath-room and a furnace. It is a small house, I am happy to say. I always hated a big place, with a lot of useless rooms to take care of. There is a dear, sweet, picturesque garden back of the house, with a funny little green paling fence and a tiny gate. The caretaker says all sorts of flowers are planted there. Some will come up of themselves in the spring; others I shall set out. The trees are big and beautiful, and a clump of lilac bushes is on either side of the path to the front entrance. There are some fruit trees out back, and a Japanese quince which will be a mass of vivid pink blossoms in a few weeks.

The room I shall take for my own special den and workshop looks into the garden and is full of southeast sunshine. I know I can do lots of work there. If I cannot continue with my "Correspondence Corner" for the "Messenger," at least I can, and will, write stories. I may even write a book, who knows? Athena says anybody who can use plain English and is willing to tell the truth about themselves can write an interesting novel!

Another thing that helps to reconcile me to a spell of Hammonds Corners is Jim's joy and interest in his new undertaking. He continues to be a transformed man, keen, brisk, eager, as he has not been for months. He seems hardly able to wait till the house is in condition for us.

What a wonderful thing it is to find yourself—to be fitted into your

Hood's Quality Corn

and Tomatoes Are Good

BECAUSE—

The Label Hood
Insures It's Good—
Why?

To obtain quality for Hood Products we can not depend on local crops, but they are grown and packed in many parts of the United States—each product in the territory where climatic and soil conditions produce the utmost in perfection.

Hood's Quality Corn

Sweet corn, to be super-excellent, must be "bred up" to a standard.

Hood's sugar corn is the result of years of experimentation in seed-corn breeding. Crossing in varieties has resulted in a quality that fairly oozes sweetness. The tender, succulent ears are pulled when the corn is in full "milk," prepared with minute care and cleanliness and "packed on the spot."

Only the Hood quality perfectly bred sweet corn is packed under the Hood Label. Accept no other kind.

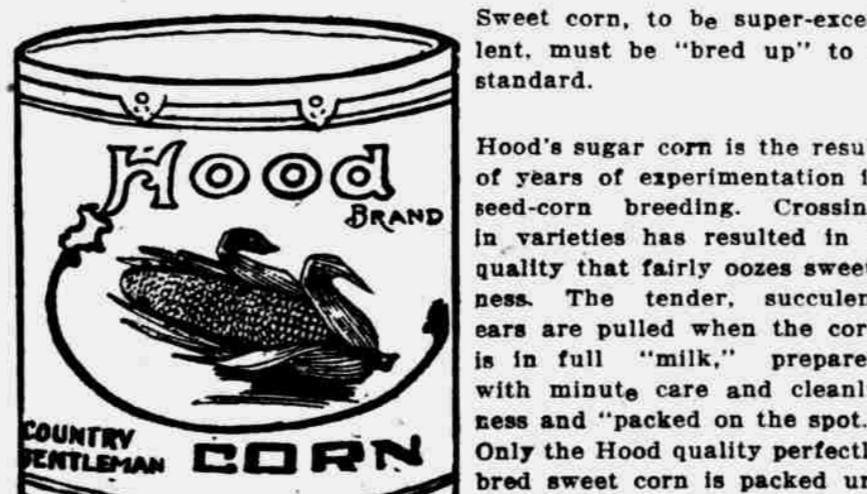

Ask Your Grocer for Hood Label Vegetables—Use Two Different Ones a Day for Satisfaction and Economy.

Hood's Quality Tomatoes

Indiana produces the finest tomatoes grown in the world. Packers vie with one another to obtain the cream of the crop. Hood's canneries are located in the counties that produce perfection in tomatoes—vivid crimson balls of meaty, zestful goodness.

The tomatoes are picked dewy and the packing is done under the strictest sanitary conditions.

The product goes to your table in perfect taste and appetizing excellence. Ask your grocer for Hood's Label tomatoes. A simple test is a taste.
