The Growing Child

A series of articles prepared especially for The Palladium, by the United States Public Health Service, Washington, D. C.]

NO. 26—GENERAL HOME CARE.
To secure the best results in health work among children there must be close co-operation between the home and the school. The work of the teacher will be much less difficult if the child has been trained in hygienic habits at home, and the mother will find her efforts supplemented and her work strengthened by the teaching of hygiene in the schools, and the oversight of her child by the medical inspector and school nurse.

Among the factors affecting the health of the child which are entirely controlled by the home, sleep is important. Children from six to ten years should have about ten or eleven hours of sleep in the twenty-four, and from ten to sixteen years the amount of sleep should be about nine hours. Every child should sleep alone (as far as this is possible) in a quiet well-ventilated room.

He should go to bed at such an hour as will make it possible for him to secure sufficient sleep and awaken naturally early enough to get to school on time without undue haste or the neglect of any duty he should perform before leaving home. The more outdoor life a child has the better he will sleep usually. On the other hand, a heavy meal in the evening, the use of tea or coffee, much home study in the evening, obstructed breathing, earache, toothache, and similar conditions, are apt to interfere with the child's sleep.

Value of Sleeping Porch.
If a sleeping porch is not available, the windows in the room should be open so that the child may have plenty of fresh air. He may be protected from drafts by the use of screens, and from cold by soft light covers and hot water bottles when necessary. During the day living rooms and school rooms should be flushed several times with fresh air for a few minutes at a time, by opening the windows.

A child's clothing should be such as to prevent any part of his body from chilling, but at the same time should not be so heavy as to cause him to perspire on slight exertion. The habitual use of too heavy clothing predisposes to "colds," which, in turn, causes a heavy drain on the child's vitality. To attempt to harden a child by undue exposure is not wise. In winter long stockings should be worn, and the feet should be protected from wetting by rubbers.

Value of Feeding.
The feeding of children is of the greatest importance, and apart from the quantity and quality of the food the time and manner of the meal should receive much consideration. Regularity of feeding should not cease when the child is weaned. Teach him to expect his meals at regular intervals and his appetite and digestion readily adapt themselves to a schedule that is strictly adhered to. Let the meals be cheerful, social occasions. The food is more easily digested when eaten in a happy atmosphere than when consumed in gloom or acrimonious argument.

The question of recreation for a school boy or girl is sometimes a difficult problem. Outdoor play and sports are ideal, but the "movies" and similar entertainments have a strong appeal. A child attending school should not go to evening entertainments of any kind on any evening except Friday or Saturday, and the child should not keep late hours then or go habitually. This applies to children in the upper grades. Younger children's entertainments should be very infrequent, and never in the evening.

Questions relating to Child Health and related problems will be answered by experts of the United States Public Health Service. Address: Child Health Service, U. S. Public Health Service, Washington, D. C. (Please mention this newspaper.)

Sunday Expected to Close Christian Church Revival
Revival services at the First Christian church will probably close Sunday night, according to an official, Saturday.

Music by a large Sunday school orchestra, and congregational singing will be under the direction of the "Brooks."

Success of a Medicine
All things succeed which fill a real need; that a doctor is kept busy day and night proves his ability and skill; that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is sold in enormous quantities in almost every city, town and hamlet in America and in foreign countries as well proves its merit, and women are found everywhere who tell of health restored by its use.—Advertisement.

A SWEETHEART AT THIRTY

The Story of a Woman's Transformation
BY MARION RUBINCAM

THE FAMILY ARGUMENT

Chapter 6.
To most families, the announcement that the daughter wants to go to college, is only a casual, or an expected statement, but to ours it was a bombshell.

We were not a backwoods family. The "old Haines place," as they called our house, stood on the edge of a straggling little village called Henly Falls. There were perhaps a hundred families in the village itself, and a hundred more who lived in sight of it—that is in sight if one stood on the top of the big hill behind our house. To the left of us, the space of half a city block, stood our nearest neighbor; to the right, the fields that made up our farm. Behind, was the big new barn, one of the finest in the country.

I threw a shawl around my shoulders after we went through the dishes and stepped out on the back porch for a breath of air. It was a clear night, with a bright moon, and I could see quite a long distance. Violet joined me, and slid her arm around my waist. The fences, or walls of field stone, piled together without cement, that distinguish New England farmland, could be made out easily. They ran in levels, waving lines over the hill, and marked off the pastures and the ploughed fields.

"I've started something," Violet told me softly. Mother is in there talking it over with father, and I guess they won't let me go. You might have thought I'd thrown a brick, the way they act. They have known all along that I wanted to go to college."

We stood together a little longer, then Violet asked, "You'll stick with me, won't you, Aunt Enid? You understand things so much better than they do—don't they?" Mothers ought to understand—but sometimes aunts are much more sympathetic.

I promised I'd help all I could, and we went in together.

"I s'pose you two have been putting your heads together out there," Esther spoke up suspiciously, as she saw us enter. "Enid of course thinks Violet ought to go—she'd let her do anything she wanted to."

"Of course I think so," I answered. "The more educated she is the more useful she will be."

"Not doing canning and summer cleaning," Esther remarked acidly. "There's Laura—she likes to—"

"Laura will be getting married in a year."

"Why, has Charlie spoken?" Jim began, but Esther interrupted.

"Not yet, but he will, I know. And there is so much work here in this big house for me, even with Enid helping—with all the gardening and outside work and chores to be done."

James came out and stood looking on from the doorway. No one paid attention to him—poor James, little attention was ever paid him.

"I'd have to give him help, or else you would have to get another man, so I wouldn't have milking and garden work," Esther said. "There would be that expense, besides the expense of the college course, and her board in town. And I won't let her go alone, that's final."

I spoke up suddenly.

"I'll go with her then."

Here was the turning point, this sudden remark of mine—but I did not know then what a momentous thing it was. Great crises often pass unnoticed.

"Well, you're old enough and plain enough to be a chaperon," Esther granted with her usual frankness. "But that would only make another pair of hands less, and all the work to be done!"

"I'll do double work," offered James suddenly. "I won't be in school next winter, so you can give me all the outside work, and you needn't get another hired man. Besides, I'll do heavy cleaning in the evenings when the farm work is over."

"James graduates in June, too," Violet put in, hoping this reminder would gain her point. But its results were unexpected. Jim had not gotten over his supper time anger. He swung around on James.

"Oh, he does, does he?" he growled. "He starts plowing the north field Monday, and after that I've enough to keep him busy."

"But father, I graduate then!" James burst out. "It's only three months, and I'll help all I can after."

school hours and study evenings." "I can use your time from nine to three," Jim said. "That's when you would be in school, and most likely reading, instead of studying, anyway," he added unreasonably.

"But father!" James's face had gone white again, and Violet's eyes were overflowing with sympathy. "I don't see as three months' studying can make any difference one way or the other," Jim said. "You have had all the lesson's practically up to the end of school work."

"But I want to grad—"

"That'll be all!" Jim roared, and the very volume of his tone stopped argument. James disappeared again. It was no time to start arguing Violet's plea. She too, left the room, softly picking up her books as she went. I settled down to think things over.

Thirty-five—and I looked 50—35 dead, dreary years behind me? Violet, all youth and force and energy, would she too be dragged down to a round of dim and dreary years? I was fully awake now—it remained to find its solution.

CONNERSVILLE, Ind., Oct. 23.—A masked bandit at 2 p. m. Thursday, held up and robbed Thomas C. McBurney, 62 years old, superintendent of the Fayette county free fair, of a gold watch valued at $100.
