

The Girl Who Had No Chance

By MARION RUBINICAM

Chapter 110.
WITH OPENED EYES.
"Who is it?" she asked. "You should have a name." She was familiar enough now with the routine service of the well-run hotels.

"No name given," the boy answered. "I'll go ask it."
"Gentleman won't give his name."
"Then I'm not here," Ruth answered, and went on with her dinner. Something in her warned her to keep herself from visitors she did not know. There had been enough unpleasant scenes.

"The boy started off, calling through the room the names of other people for whom he had messages. Ruth poured herself some coffee and looked up to find Tim standing by her table.
"Do you mind if I sit down a moment?" he asked, his voice casual enough as he took the empty chair. "I do mind," Ruth answered. "I think you might have known it."
"I phoned up to your apartment and got no answer," Tim went on as though Ruth had not spoken. "So I had you paged, on the chance that you were still in the hotel. When the boy came back and asked my name I knew you were here. So I followed him and watched to see which table he went to first.

Ruth's waiter came up asking whether the "gentleman would dine." The girl shook her head impatiently, called for her check and signed it. Her hand shook as she picked up the pencil and shook still more when she picked up her coffee cup.
"And just why did you come at all?" she asked coldly.

"Because I want to see. I've got to see you!"

"To apologize again, I suppose?"
"No. Don't you think I know there's no apology possible for the trick I played on you last night? I know I'm pretty bad sometimes, but I didn't know Myra was going to come down here and make a row the way she did."

"Which doesn't excuse the fact that you are too weak to tell her the whole truth, and too weak to refrain from telling her part of it—the part you wanted told." Ruth stood up. "I am going to my rooms now. So good-night."

"I'm coming too," Tim answered. And Ruth thought she saw curious eyes upon her. They were standing in the lobby. If Tim was going to make a scene, at least she preferred to deal with him alone. There was something in his eyes, a certain recklessness that she did not like. But she felt quite equal to any situation, only she did not want to have an audience of strangers. So she said nothing, but let him come up to her suite with her.

In the living room she turned and faced him.

"I have three rooms here. This next one is my own private little sitting room. My maid is in there; she was there last night when you—"
"I shan't try to kiss you again," Tim said. "My God, Ruth, you needn't be afraid of me—not after all the years you have known me!"
"I am not afraid," Ruth softened at once to his plea, as she always did to any appeal he made.

Heart Problems

Dear Mrs. Thompson: I am a girl of 18 and have been keeping company with two boys, one whom I dearly love and intend to be true to, but the other I don't care for at all and can't seem to get rid of him. I have told him and still he hangs around. Please tell me what to do about it.

The other boy tells me he loves me, but I have caught him in two lies and don't like to hurt him by telling him I know he has lied to me. What shall I do about it?

KEWPIE 18.
Keep saying "No" to the young man for whom you do not care. Eventually he will wake up to the fact that you really do not want him.

It seems to me a very serious matter to be in love with a young man who does not respect the truth. It may make you feel badly to have him misrepresent now, but imagine how much worse you would feel if you were lied to by your husband. Do not pry into your friend's affairs and make him tell you whether or not he is going with other girls, but when he deliberately tells an untruth and you know it, tell him that you would like him better if he respected you enough to tell you the truth and nothing but the truth. You are rather young to be seriously in love.

Dear Mrs. Thompson: Is it possible to meet a young man that the girls nowadays would call slow? I have tried time after time, but there either isn't any or else they have not happened to be any place that I have been. I would just love to have some one that is gentle and of a quiet disposition to talk to, but young men all seem so fickle.

DISCOURAGED.
You have not met the right man yet. I think if you keep your ideals and guard yourself so that you will be ready for the right man when he does come, you will not be disappointed. Of course young men are fickle, but it is only right that they should be until they want to marry. A man should not be fickle, however, and at the same time make love.

"I haven't any reason for coming," Tim said, beginning to walk up and down the room. "Myra came back furious. You can believe that. I guess Gaby did it—she says Gaby did all the talking, but she was mad because you kept quiet and let her."

"Then I blew up because she had come down on such a silly jealous errand. I never knew Myra was jealous—she is so good natured about things. But I guess she is very much in love with me." In spite of his general agitation, a little satisfaction crept into his voice. Ruth saw the vanity behind the remark, and remembered, too, the self-satisfied manner with which Myra referred to Tim's constant devotion.

She smiled, cynically, but said nothing.
"Of course I shouldn't have told her you fussed about my not being here. I got you to do it, made you do it. And I didn't have the nerve to say so to her. Everything Gaby said about me was probably right. She despises me. I despise myself sometimes."

He went over to one of the big chairs and threw himself down into it. Ruth stood by the table, watching him curiously out of sympathy with him.

"It doesn't matter whether Myra was jealous or not," she said finally. "It's a mean nasty thing to feel; I felt it, too, about her—years ago. But I haven't given her any reason to be jealous of me, so I can't say I am very sorry for her."

"No, I suppose you are too happy to feel sorry about anything or anything," Tim answered. Myra told me that, too—that you said you were engaged to that Williams. She said before you were in love with someone because she thought I would lose interest in you, and it always made me furiously jealous instead."

"This time I believe her though—because of his card and the flowers he sent you there on the table. You had roses last night—now you've got chrysanthemums. I suppose he sent them too."

Ruth looked at him for a long time. Should she tell him or not? What effect would it have if she said she loved Langley—would Tim go away then? Or would this sudden jealousy come up in him again?
Tomorrow—Awakening.

A WORD ABOUT SHOES.

We are all grateful for the warm weather which allows us to go about with low shoes and free ankles. The feet and the ankles are much healthier in summer simply because of this greater freedom. But there is one danger to the foot that comes from wearing summer shoes and that is the danger of not giving it proper support.

Pumps are so becoming and so good looking that their popularity will probably always continue, but they are not the healthiest sort of shoe. They do allow almost perfect ventilation of the foot because they are loose and light, but they do not give the foot and ankle the support it should have.

This is particularly true of the high heeled pump which is the favorite choice of almost every woman because it makes the foot look smaller. A low heeled pump is not so bad since it allows the weight of the body to rest on the heel and the ball of the foot. Probably the ideal shoe is the Oxford with a low or military heel. This gives a support around the heel and over the ball of the foot, and over the instep as well. The new types of pump that have straps coming over the instep are, however, almost as good and, of course, much dressier in appearance.

To be healthy as well as good looking, the shoe should fit very snugly

under and around the instep. Cheap shoes are always made very wide at this place, so that the middle part of the foot is allowed to settle down without any support. The instep has

BENTLEY TO PRESENT NAMES OF TEACHERS

Teachers to fill vacancies created by the resignations of 23 public school instructors at the close of the school term, will be recommended at the meeting of the school board at 4 o'clock Wednesday. Prof. J. H. Bentley, superintendent of schools, will make the recommendations.

Since the announcement by the resigning teachers that they were not candidates for re-election, there has been rumors indicating that other teachers were not planning to return in the fall. However, resignations from these teachers have not been received by Prof. Bentley.

Tobacco Company Sues Growers at Greenville

GREENVILLE, July 6.—Suit was filed in common pleas court here late yesterday by the Smith-Cooking Tobacco Company, of this city, against Lester Smith and Martin Cain, seeking to recover the sum of $200. The tobacco company alleges that it purchased seventeen cases of tobacco from the defendants at the price of 16c per pound, but upon its delivery it was not the same as the sample on which the sale was made, and its real worth was in the neighborhood of 5c per pound.

Arrested for Drunkenness
After payment of $25 and costs each, Fred Nolzapfel, James Connors and Orville Norlacher, local young men, were released from custody at Versailles yesterday, where they had been confined to the village jail on a charge of being drunk and disorderly. It is alleged the young men, while intoxicated, smashed an automobile into a filling station. One of them attempted to escape from the jail by means of a window, but was quickly recaptured.
