Beauty Chats

BRUSH THE HAIR GLOSSY

Glossy hair is so desirable that many women obtain an artificial lustre by using various brilliantines that every beauty parlor sells. There are times when it is all right to make use of something like this, but as a constant habit, these things are to be avoided most carefully. They clog the pores of the hair and they coat the scalp and make a normal healthy action of the skin more difficult. But if there is some occasion when the hair must look well immediately, and it seems without life or lustre, then there is no harm in using an artificial gloss.

Healthy hair, however, is always glossy. If yours is so oily that it is only sticky or so dry that it is dull or fuzzy, you must begin and treat the scalp until you have restored it to a normally healthy condition. Then your hair will have a natural lustre. One way of doing this is to brush the hair thoroughly every day, particularly if your hair is long and thick. The action of the bristles of the hair-brush over the scalp stimulates the oil cells so that oil is forced down each hair, and it is the oil in the hair that gives it polish and lustre. Besides stimulating, a thorough brushing is also cleansing, for it takes from the hair a great deal of the dust and soot that is blown into it every day.

After you have finished brushing, put a big puff of absorbent cotton over the bristles of the brush and go over the bristles of the brush and go over the hair with this. It is cleansing and

CAPE INFLUENCE IS SEEN IN NEW SPRING FROCKS

The cape influence which prevails in the cloaks and suits for spring is being repeated in some of the newer frocks. This frock with a cape back is made of Poiret twill with edges bound in gray canton crepe. A metal belt and buttons on the cuffs complete the trimming.

It gives the hair a glossiness that even the most thorough brushing with the bristles of the hair-brush will not produce.
